Lectures for Calforna.

In conference with Bishop Weaver, I received the assurance that he will aid the friends of our reform on the Pacific coast by speaking at three or four prominent points, if arrangements were made by the friends for him to do so. This will be good news to our friends, and I trust they will avail themselves of this providential opening to secure the services of so efficient and able a helper. The Bishop will be in California May 7th, 1875, and we shall hope to hear from friends in that State, and to aid in perfecting arrangements in detail. J. P. STODDARD.

Topics of the Time.

The theater discussion which the Sabbath breaking managers have forced with prominence in New York has drawn out strong condemnation from several pulpits. Talmage and Cuyler have been fervent in the war against the system. A few respectable men are found to defend it, as is usual in moral conflicts, and others, like Edward Eggleston, seek to hush the contention. The theater is evil from the influences surrounding and woven through and through it. Like games with cards, long and intimate association with evil has forever fixed its character; and artists of the highest talent and of best repute have given their testimony against it.

With other and greater wrongs the workingmen's secret unions are everywhere perpetuating the costly and ruinous custom of strikes. It is, indeed, a principal end of their existence to accumulate funds to lavish in strife with employers. One English society claims a capital of $2,000,000, a nother of over $1,000,000. The miners' societies of Pennsylvania have the most of the colliers' savings and will squander it without benefit to their members. Strikes add also another column of dollars and cents. The men are out of work, their capital of time, strengh, and skill, yielding a moderate income, is wasted and idled away. It is estimated that the strikers in the Pittsburgh furnaces lose $1,000,000 per week from this cause alone. This is really so much destroyed from the world's capital, and of course lessens the chances for future employment for themselves and others. The less capital, the less labor. The vexed problem of the relations of these two forces will never be settled by trades unions. They prevent amicable adjustment. Collieries, manufacturies, printing houses are managed peaceably and justly where they are excluded; but only an armed place can exist with them.

The campaign against the common schools has opened. Bishop McQuaid, of Rochester, New York, made an address in the largest hall of Cleveland, Ohio, last Thursday, before the Central Catholic Association, in which he violently attacks the public school system of Ohio and claims that the teacher of teachers is the Catholic church. Ohio seems to be the chosen battle ground for this question. The struggle in Cincinnati, nearly successful, will be remembered. When the new Constitution was preparing the Catholics worked hard in convention and afterward at the polls, and extravagantly claimed the honor of its defeat. In the October elections the priests commanded the vote of the Romanists for the Democratic party, and now rely on the aid of that party in the Legislature to divide the school fund for their own schools. We cannot think this will ever be permitted, but these teachers of jesuitry have a strong ally in the indifference of the people. "Eternal vigilance" has become a song; and like Samson, we dandle securely on the knees of the Roman Delilah. Unless every Christian pulpilt, every Christian voice, cries to heaven and to warn our land may again be ruthlessly awakened to a banquet of blood.

The Atlantic Monthly and the Galaxy lately lent their columns to long accounts and arguments based thereon to prove the wonderful materializing of spirits. A pair of practitioners from England set themselves up in Philadelphia last spring and astonished their dupes with presenting them the embodied ghost of a Katie King two hundred years dead. Even Hon. Richard Dale Owen, who wrote to the Atlantic, conceived the proof positive. He saw "Katie" embodied rise from the floor, spoke with her, took her plump hand, dandled her hair, and beheld her vanish into thin air. "Katie" has, however, been found to be a veritable flesh-and-bones body who quarters at a retired boarding house, and the glory of spiritualism is like many other things earthly —a sham. The remark of the New York Tribune on the credulity of men of the Owen class, has a wider application than to the present case: "A man who is too strong minded to believe in Christianity, and who yet finds no difficulty in believing that spirits come out of a closet and dance break-downs on a platform, and spin musquito netting out of the air, is scarcely a promising subject for argument. To say he disbelieves the Bible because he cannot understand it, and believes in Katy King because he has seen her, simply shows that he is as vain of the feebleness of his understanding as he is of the blindness of his eyes."

Secret Societies.

BY A. M. MILLIGAN, D. D.

We see among us organizations of men of different names, such as Jesuits, Masons, Odd-fellows, Ku-Klux Klan, etc. They number their numbers by thousands. Their halls and temples, imposing and costly, are prominent on our streets. Millions of dollars find their way into their coffers. Their influence both in church and state is frequently and offensively displayed, and yet their true character is carefully enveloped in mystery, and we are left to ascertain it by such facts and developements as appear, and reasonable deductions therefrom. It is not to be supposed that men will band together without a purpose, or if their purpose be honest and honorable that they will hesitate to make it known. If they conceal their purpose, we have a right to conclude that it is not a proper one. If they parade some laudable but minor object before the public, while upon other parts of their operations they enjoin the most rigid secrecy, we have a right to conclude that the proclaimed object is but a blind to deceive the public, and a bait to entrap the unwary. If, moreover, they bind their members to conceal their secrets from their nearest friends at every hazzard and from courts of justice, even when the ends of justice require their revelation; and when these obligations are enforced by the most terrible oaths, we have a right to conclude that these secrets which they thus carefully guard are of more importance than the friendships they violate, than the family concord they endanger and destroy, than the justice they thwart, and the safety of society they imperil.

If, moreover, I find a society separated into different ranks and degrees, in which the secrets of the higher degrees are concealed from the lower, under the most fearful oaths and pledges, I am entitled to conclude that there are purposes and aims intended by the order which the lower degrees do not understand or perhaps dream of, and which it is of the highest consequence that they should not know, until by the trials and ordeals through which they are passed they are found to be safe repositories of the terrible secret, and ripe for the perpetration of the part assigned them.

When we see the lower degrees of the order placed under the most absolute subjection and control of the higher, without the right to know the purpose for which they are to be used; and when we see the lower degrees required to pay large sums, a considerable portion of which is passed up into the hands of the higher degrees, we cannot but conclude that there is a concentration of power in hands that are not responsible to those from whom it is derived, and that persons are required to give their money and their services to purposes which, if known to them, they might utterly abhor and to which they would never consent.

Another feature I cannot pass over in silence. When I see an organization binding its members to conceal and never reveal the secrets of a brother, even though they should be criminal, and excepting such crimes as "murder and treason" in the lower degrees—and leaving even these optional, or even not excepted in the higher—a reasoning mind will conclude that the purpose and aim sought by the order is, or may be, either in whole or in part itself criminal. And when I see the higher degrees bound to keep more criminal secrets and bound by more terrible oaths, I conclude that the degrees are so many grades of preparation for the education and puparation of their members, and for ascertaining whether their members are prepared for the more criminal and horrible parts they may be called to perform in the higher degrees to which they are passed; the first being only an Entered Apprentice, farther on a Master, and higher still a Royal Arch.

Consistent with this view it would naturally be supposed that in the first two or three degrees the novitiate would not be permitted to see or know anything that would at all shock his moral sense, while all the better features used as binds would be shown and impressed upon his mind and applied to his selfishness as of great advantage to him; while at the same time all the skill of the art would be applied to make it difficult if not impossible to retrace his steps and to reconcile his conscience to what in it might seem obnoxious. Hence we see many excellent men, without a dream of evil, entering the lower degrees and remaining there all their lives, paying their dues and receiving their benefits. We see others going a certain distance and quietly dropping out of the ranks, and, perhaps, through fear of their oaths or dread of the vengence of a powerful organization, smothering in their own bosoms what their better nature might prompt them to reveal. While still another class have felt it their duty to come out before the world and renounce their obligations and reveal their secrets.

Thus I have endeavored frankly and fairly to trace the character of secret organizations from the ordinary and legitimate meaning of their actions. I presume your readers will judge differently of the conclusiveness of the evidence I have adduced of their character. Some, perhaps all, will agree that the delineation is possible; others that it is probable; some that it is self-evident and certain. I submit that a society of which it is even possible that such may be its character is dangerous, as the old Trojan said, "Timeo Danaos etiam dona ferentis,"—I am afraid of the Greeks even when they bring gifts.

But we are not left entirely to conjecture on their character. The world is familiar with the bloody raids of the Ku-Klux. The rebellion that cost the nation four years of war, and half a million of patriot lives, and four billions of treasure, was the work of the "Knights of the Golden Circle. The well attested murder of Morgan reveals the capabilities of the Masonic order, while the Jesuits for their nefarious deeds have been expelled from every Catholic State in Europe. I will defer a consideration of their oaths for another paper.

Church Customs.

BY NATHAN CALLENDER.

1st. Corner-stone ceremonies. Whence this custom? Where in the Scriptures do we find any warrant for such ceremonies as usually practiced on the occasions called, "laying the corner-stone?"

2d. Installation of ministers to their charge. Where in the Scriptures do we find authority for this? In the Old, or in the New Testament, which? We are anxious to know. Let the very best Scripture reason that can be given appear to relieve us of our doubts.

3d. Still another custom—Set forms in our church worship. Each sect having its own, or, in some of these agreeing in a common one. Ought not the work to be varied, governed by the circumstances and condition?

4th. And, finally, what of funerals? Keeping the dead so as to bury on the Lord's day. Can we not find in the Bible, how the people of God used to bury their dead? Was it anywhere near the set forms of the funeral of this age? To some, all these questions may seem insignificant. But the old Protestant rule is, surely, of much consequence to all true Christians. The closer we follow our models in all religious work, the safer we shall be from following any of the pompous and disgusting ceremonies of papal Rome and Freemasonry.

Are not the corner-stones of our churches laid, in some degree, in papal style, or in Masonic? Is it the love of ceremony that crops out of the old Adamic nature that prompts these installations, etc?

Does some good brother here suggest to me that these ceremonies have about as good a foundation as Baptist Associations. Well, I have only to thank him for the suggestion. In all my soundings, I never could find, in the Scriptures, in form and fact, a Baptist Association. And when to the Scriptures we turn in vain, whither shall we go?

The Bearing of Oath-bound Secretism on Christian Piety.

BY A. D. FREEMAN.

A careful and critical examination of the nature of the oaths and penalties imposed on the membership, will aid very much in understanding this subject.

In the Entered Apprentice degree, the candidate is sworn in a manner to include all that is in the oath or obligation of every succeeding degree.

"I will always hail, ever conceal, and never reveal any part or parts, art or arts, point or points, . . . which I have received, am about to receive, or may hereafter be instructed in." This covers the whole ground in every obligation. We have, then, only to look carefully to some of these parts, arts or points, to see that the bearing must be injurious to piety.

Take, for instance, the fact that the oath imposed on the candidate is a profane oath, just what our Saviour forbids. The Bible does not permit any, but such as are involved in our religious obligations, or imposed by civil government. But these Masonic oaths and those of kindred societies are neither; and are therefore profane. For this reason every man who takes such an oath, (no matter by whom imposed) and keeps it, is held by a profane oath, which is equivalent to a continuous swearing profanely.

That is one part or point. Now take another. "Of my own free will and accord in the presence of Almighty God." Not enough to swear continuously and profanely; but he impiously calls on God to witness it, and this is a standing, unrevoked invocation that God may witness his profanity. What horrible effrontery! It is true the initiated does not, perhaps, see, while going through the process, the enormous sin he commits; but he has leisure afterwards to consider the matter, so that while he holds himself bound by his oath he is guilty, as if he saw it at first, of uncreasing profanity.

Then in his oath he acknowledges, and of course, accepts the "Dedication;" of that profane nest of unclean birds, called "Worshipful lodge" "to God." The langauge is, "Dedicated to God and held forth to the holy order of St. John." Can such blasphemy be paralleled? Yes, and more, in what follows and is scattered all along through the whole order to the numerically highest degree, but in point of degradation, to the lowest. But this alone is enough to stamp the whole with eternal infamy. For the lodge is where blasphemous oaths are taken, and worse than savage penalties are imprecated, in accordance with which mischief of every grade and degree is plotted. Nothing evil or vile that is not implied or directly contemplated as the legitimate end of lodge life.

Let us now look more particularly at the penalty of this degree. "Under no less penalty than to have my throat cut across, and my tongue torn out by the roots," etc. Think of it! Look at the sight! Is this benevolence as it is claimed for the order? Can this be the hand-maid of religion as Masons affirm? Can piety endure the shock and live? Will it not turn pale, gasp and die? Can piety live in voluntary suicide and murder invited? Can such savagery and Christian piety be identical? or even subsist together in the same breast?

Then there are penalties still more brutal and fiendish, if possible, voluntarily accepted and endorsed by the whole fraternity; at least by their silence or neglect or refusal to expose them. Such as, "My left breast torn open;" "heart and vitals taken out;" "my body sundered in the midst, and bowels burned to ashes;" "skull cleft off and brains exposed to the scorching rays of the meridian sun," etc., etc. Did these come from a pious mind and heart? or can they be accepted, cherished, or entertained by a Christian soul? Then there are the promises of secrecy of every crime known to the laws of God and man, capping the climax with "murder and treason not accepted." Then, as if to out-do all, there is an appeal made to God for help to execute crimes and profane promises such as will stagger the firmest mind, in this language: "So help me God and keep me steadfast in the due performance of the same." Now can any mind or heart, held by such oaths and obligations be otherwise than impious. I know, as is falsely claimed in evidence of the excellence of these orders, that some of these men are active members of the church; which may be taken, and perhaps should be, as a deceptive advertising of the (non-existing) goodness of the fraternity; or as a conscience-silencer and guilt-smotherer, or, perhaps, both. So watch them carefully, scrutinize them closely, with all the charity that piety can furnish you; and you will feel that the one thing needful is lacking in them. You will, despite all your desire to find piety in them feel that it is wanting. Their activity will seem hollow and heartless; and you will likely say, "Poor souls, they seem not to know what they do or what they are;" as the most charitable conclusions that sanctified reason can reach. I think it is clear that most of them appear to lose their seeming piety soon after their union with these orders as evinced by much they say and do. For instance, many say, "If I must leave one, the church or Masonry, I will leave the church. What surer evidence that piety is wanting, or wavering? How such a saying must effect others is manifest. Their tendency is to shake the confidence of others in the religion of such men, or in religion itself. A few such members in a church will cool the ardor of piety even in the hearts of many if not in the whole body.

Let us now turn our attention to the duplicity practiced in their efforts to keep secret the ugly features of their orders. Now, remember, they are sworn to "ever conceal and never reveal," and they try to do this by such expressions as the following: "What do you know about it?" "You know nothing about it." "There is no truth in these pretended revelations." "These men who pretend to reveal our secrets are perjured villians." (Quite select, but highly Masonic.) "How can you know anything of these orders, unless you have been a member." Just as if nothing had been exposed; when they know the whole has been and is made public, and others who have given attention to the matter understand it, just as well as they do. "Perjured villians!" Then if they are, Masonry is revealed, and if Masonry is not revealed then according to Masonic definition, they are not perjured. But, then, violation of a Masonic oath is not perjury, but just what God commands—repentance unto life, the only righteous thing a Mason can do in regard to his oath. It is "breaking off from sin by righteousness," or it is ceasing to swear profanely. He simply breaks off from profanity. Ought not a man to do that? And can the opposite course be other than a bane to piety? Then they lie, deceive and cajole men into the lodge. (Not all of them; no, not all. Some Masons will not do that, though they might as well, as silently look on and see others do it.) And when told by their dupes, why this is just what is out and the people have it, and you told us these revelations were not true they reply, with cool impudence, Well, the cowans are in doubt; they don't feel certain. Can piety wink at such things and live? Can it bear such fellowship and not be, or become a shadow or less? Fellowship and association with such men must necessarily render impure and adulterate the piety of any Christian who is not rigidly and strenuously watchful and prayerful. And without these safeguards a whole church may be leavened with these guileful and deceptious sayings and doings. These characteristics are contagious and will prove noxious in their effects upon a Christian's piety when off his guard.

These orders are therefore continually weakening the religious force of the church of God and her powers for restraining men from going the way to death, and by just so much, neutralizing her power to save men from perdition. And by just so much also they rob the great principles that underlie society, and the institutions of civil government, and the home or domestic circle, of their binding moral force; and supplant confidence with jealousy and fear; and furnish most fearful auguries of approaching anarchy and coming dissolution, in church and state, and in the social and domestic circles. And it is passing strange that intelligent men, and especially Christian men, in these orders, do not see these unavoidable results, and forever renounce all alliance with these destructive institutions. This concentrated selfishness having for its animus distilled iniquity, cannot be other than death on all upon which it can exercise its legitimate and natural forces.

—The New Jersey Grange; Home Granger, St. Louis, Mo.; Brain and Muscle, Ames, Iowa; Grangers' Visitor, Port Huron, Mich; Grangers' Advocate, Rockport, Mo., Husbandman, Mt. Sterling, O., (the New York World announces this latter death, of which we did not know previously); all these "organs" of the grange and "friends of the farmer" have succumbed to the inevitable, and have "gone under" within a week or so. Persons who contemplate deserting, or have deserted, established papers to subscribe for the collections of platitudes and bosh such as the average grange "organ," had better pause and calculate the chances of their getting what they subscribe for.—Western Rural.

The Young Men's Christian Association.

BY MRS. EZRA A. COOK.

Hon. Carl Schurz says that by providing amusements, wholesome recreation, for people we do more to bless mankind than by contributing to the support of missionary associations. The present flourishing condition of the Young Men's Christian Association is due, we think, to the fact that it meets in a measure this necessity for wholesome recreation.

"Young men must have some place to go." These Associations begin at the right point, with man's moral nature, they say, your basis of action is unsound if you are in rebellion towards God. Change it. Put yourself upon a solid foundation, of which Jesus Christ is the chief corner-stone. They give the study of the Bible a chief place in their Associations. Their secondary work is to supply the wants of the mental faculties, by providing good libraries and newspapers. In some Associations, instruction in various branches of science is provided while good lectures, concerts and sociables, designed to make religious life social, and social life religious, together with gymnasiums, give all the recreation which people whose time belongs to God ought to have leisure to engage in.

There are one hundred and twenty-two Young Men's Christian Associations, (with fifteen branch Associations) in England, eighteen in Scotland, seven in Ireland, five in Switzerland, three in France, one each in Germany, Holland and Honolulu, and nine hundred in the British Provinces and the United States.

The International Y. M. C. A. for the United States and British Provinces has held nineteen general conferences in thirteen different political divisions of America, and has during all these long years been slowly gathering experience and strength. Its business is in the hands of an Executive Committee of seven, elected once in three years. The present committee is serving its third term. It employs one General Secretary and one General Agent.

The local and State work of the body is carried on to a great extent independently of the International organization, and in these comparatively local organizations is found the strength of the whole organism.

The finest building for religious purposes in the United States is said to belong to the Y. M. C. A. in New York city. It is valued at $500,000. The Evangelical Alliance met in it in October, 1873. The value of Association buildings in different parts of our country is now nearly $2,000,000.

By giving young men a better organization than a secret society to join they are doing a work that we rejoice in.

In the test resolution which all the Associations auxiliary to the International adopt, those churches that put the management of their affairs into the hands of unregenerate trustees might learn a profitable lesson. We quote their "active membership test resolution."

"Resolved, That, as these organizations bear the name of Christian, and profess to be engaged directly in the Saviour's service, so it is clearly their duty to maintain the control and management of all their affairs in the hands of those who profess to love and publicly avow their faith in Jesus, the Redeemer, as Divine, and who testify their faith by becoming and remaining members of churches held to be evangelical. And we hold those churches to be evangelical, which, maintaining the Holy Scripture to be the only infallible rule of faith and practice, do believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (the only begotten of the Father, King of kings, and Lord of lords, in whom dwelleth the fullness of the Godhead bodily, and who was made sin for us, though knowing no sin, bearing our sins in his own body on the tree), as the only name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved from everlasting punishment."

The fact that this clear statement of position on the most vital of all subjects was not made until fifteen years after the first General Convention, shows that the Association is a progressive one. The adoption of this article gave a new impetus to their work.

The ground taken by this Association on the subject of temperance is decided and good. We cannot say so much for its position on the subject of secret societies. Mr. Reynolds, one of the leading workers in Peoria, Illinois, is in sympathy with those who oppose them. The General Agent disapproves of them in a positive, though quiet way. But the Chicago Association (at least) at present, intends to occupy a neutral place on this question.

But we pray and also believe that when they see in Freemasonry a system of religion, ignoring salvation through Christ, encouraging intemperance and vice, breaking up the Scriptural unity of families and destroying or nullifying Christian fraternity, by the use of artificial and sinful obligations which unite Christians with the unregenerate in the closest fellowship by solemn vows, they will leave adhering Freemasons with Unitarians and Universalists in a society outside of their own. And with the ten or twelve evangelical denominations which have their testimony now on record, they also will say, "Come out from among them and be ye separate."

The History of the Vatican Struggle.

Archbishop Manning has taken another step forward in the Ultramontane controversey. He has produced the whip of coercion and flourishes it from his pulpit. The Catholics of his diocese must now acknowledge the dogma of Infallibility upon penalty of excommunication. We read the following cable dispatch with some surprise mixed with astonishment at the temerity of the command:

LONDON, Nov. 30—5:30 A. M.—A circular letter from Archbishop Manning was read in all the Catholic churches of the diocese yesterday, declaring that all persons who do not accept the dogma of Papal Infallibility cease to be Catholics.

This, taken in conjunction with the removal of the British representative at the Vatican to Lisbon, which is a sufficient comment upon the temporal weakness of "the immemorial throne," shows that the struggle now raging in Prussia may yet break out in some form in England. As the issues in Prussia are, abstractly at least, the issues the world over, it is important that the reader should have an intelligent view of the origin of the controversy and the real points at issue between the Ultramontanes and the German Government. We therefore present the historical points as briefly as possible, reserving a discussion of the issues until another occasion.

From the peace of Westphalia, in 1649, after the terrible Thirty Years' War, until the last meeting of the Vatican Council, the Roman Catholics in Prussia were as free as any other sect. They had great influence at Court, drew larger revenues from the Government than the Protestants in proportion to their numbers, and their bishops were princes with princely revenues. In 1850, the Constitution of Prussia gave to all the churches complete independence in their own affairs and the unrestricted enjoyment of their revenues. Under cover of this article, the Jesuits commenced an aggressive propagandism in the schools, convents, charities, and churches, and sought to use the "Centre" party in Parliament as an agency to effect their purposes. In other words, Prussia had given the Roman hierarchy an opportunity to establish itself as an organic power within the State, just as our own Government did in the case of the slave oligarchy. The Ultramontanes took advantage of it, and raised the issue which compelled Prussia to protect its own sovereignty.

The battle of Sadowa, in 1866, was the first decisive blow at the political encroachments of the Papacy. It drove Austria from Germany and Italy, and placed Protestant Prussia at the head of the North German Bund. The Prussian Catholics in the German-Italian war fought against the Ultamontane power, and were as loyal as the Protestants to their Government; but the Ultramontanes grew alarmed as they saw that there was a prospect of a great German Empire under a Protestant head, and the Jesuits set to work sowing the seeds of dissention more busily than ever by attempting to arouse an enemy in South Germany against North Germany, and by creating divisions in the Bund itself. 1859 the Vatican Council was held and ratified the dogma of Infallibility and the Syllabus, which made the Pope absolute over the bishops and priests, and at once brought him in collision with political society as the infallible executor of the authority conferred upon him by the Syllabus. Prussia, however, did not interfere with the Council, did not restrain her bishops from attending, and took no steps to defend herself from the intrigues of the Ultramontanes. In 1870-'71, France was conquered, and Louis Napoleon, the protector of papal temporal power, was an exile. Rome became the Capital of united Italy, and Germany became a Parliamentary Empire under the King of Prussia. In February, 1871, a deputation from the Pope waited upon the Emperor and besought him to dispossess Victor Emanuel of the Capital. He refused to make war upon Italy, and then the Ultramontane war commenced upon him. The Jesuits immediately entered into a conspiracy against the State, and the clergy denounced the Empire as hostile to the church, and sought to incite sedition and violence. The first note of warning came from Catholic Bavaria, and resulted in the passage of three genereral laws. These were the act of Dec. 10, 1871, which made it a penal offense for clergymen to incite riots by harangues against the Government; the act of July 4, 1872, banishing the Jesuits from the Empire, for which Prussia had the precedents of Catholic Austria, and Spain, and the Republic of Switzerland, as well as of some of the popes themselves; and the act of 1872, providing for State inspection of public schools. The Ultramontanes set themselves in opposition to the law, demanded that the dogma of Infallibility should be taught in the schools, and excommunicated those Catholic teachers who refused to teach it. The Prussian Government again came to the rescue of its citizens, and passed the famous Falk ecclesiastical laws of 1873, which were five in number. The first, which was in the interests of religious freedom, provided for a regular method of secession from the church. The second was a measure of personal protection, limiting and defining church penalties, and forbidding the Bishop to use the forms of civil penalties. The third was for the protection of the common clergy themselves, and gave them a mode of redress against tyrannical ecclesiastical discippline. The fourth provided for the training of the clergy, the intention being to require each student intended for the priesthood first to receive a secular education before studying theology and taking holy orders. As the expense of his education as well as his salary comes from the State, it was claimed that he should first be instructed in the fundamental branches of knowlege before he dipped into dogmas and the requirements of ecclesiastical dictation. The fifth made civil marriage obligatory, no matter how many church ceremonies might precede or follow it.

The above are the salient facts in the history of this great contest. So far as Prussia is concerned it is a political struggle for sovereignty; not a struggle whether Prussia shall have this or that form of religion, but whether its civil laws shall be obeyed, and whether her citizens shall render their political allegiance to the government of the State or to the government of the Pope within the State.—Chicago Tribune.

Reform News.

—A strong and encouraging meeting was held in Wheaton last Friday evening. See editorial.

—The New York State Convention held in Lockport this week will be adjourned when this number gets to readers. Barlow, Stoddard, Clark the singer, and other good men each of whom is a host were coming, and we expect a report next week. The death of Bro. Crooks of Syracuse, cast a heavy shadow over the meeting.

—The meeting arranged for Prof. Blanchard at the Baptist Theological Seminary last Thursday failed; a sad comment on the students, who voted finally that they did not want the lecture. An effort to obtain the neighboring church met a rebuff. These young theologues are recommend to a New Testament character named Pilate who in a dark hour asked "What is truth?" but played the coward when love of truth might cost him a position They have enough of "bread and butter" theology, as the discussion of the week before proved.

—Prof. Blanchard is now speaking in Pittsburgh.

From the Ohio Agent.

DAYTON, O., Dec. 12, 1874.

BRO. KELLOGG:—Being at present in the sanctum of the Religious Telescope office, I am half inclined to drop you a few lines from this place of editorial thought, in hopes that the mantle of profound thinkers may fall for the time being on your humble correspondent, thereby enabling him to say something that may interest the friends of our mutual cause.

I have been in conference with many of the friends of our cause, in which a free interchange of thought has been had upon the status of our movement, and the prospects of success. Among which I may be permitted to name Doctor Davis, President of the Theological Seminary of the U. B. church; Rev's Milton Wright and W. O. Tobey, editors of the Telescope; Rev. William Dillon of the U. B church, and Rev. Mr. Junkins of the Presbyterian church, who gave an able and interesting lecture to the students and friends of the school on last evening. These dear brethren seem heartily with us in our reform, and promise—yes, they give us their hearty co-operation in our efforts to thwart the purposes of wicked men in their endeavors to frustrate the purposes of church and state.

I have given in Montgomery and Butler counties five lectures at the following places: Seven Mile and Millville, Butler Co., and Liberty and Johnsonville, Montgomery Co., with I trust good success. I go to-day to Ithica, Dark Co., where the friends have arranged for more meetings, from thence I go to Logan Co., where I hope to labor the next week till the 20th. On the 21st and 22d I expect to be at home when I hope to meet the General Agent, Rev. J. P. Stoddard, whom I desire much to see.

I arrived here on Saturday afternoon; was met at the train by Bro. P. Cromwell and taken to his home where refreshment was had preparatory to my first lecture at this place. I had two of the largest audiences here that I have had in this part of the State. All seemed intensely interested, and a silence most profound prevailed throughout. I lectured on Saturday night and Monday night, the 12th and 14th. On Sabbath I preached to a very good and attentive audience. The friends of our cause here are very much encouraged, and regard our meetings as a decided success. I intended to have been here two weeks earlier, but by some means the letter designed to inform me of the time did not reach me, hence I failed to get there at the first meeting appointed, but fortunately Bro's Dillon and Wright were there and addressed the people two evenings successively, of which efforts the people speak in highest praise. Upon the whole they now regard it as a good providence that I did not get there at the first meeting, as by the means they got double the amount of labor they had expected.

Having just returned from meeting, it being ten o'clock P. M., I resume my pen and paper to finish this scroll and to say that I expect now to start for home to-morrow morning in view of having this afternoon received a letter from Mrs. C. informing me of the ill health of our youngest child, which indicates duty in that direction. I shall visit this part of the State again soon, D. V., as the people are waked up to a proper appreciation of this great question, and are very urgent to have lectures here and in other places in the south-west part of the State. I have a few subscribers for the Cynosure which I will forward as soon as I get home. I learn through Mrs. C's letter that Bro. Stoddard is in Ontario, Richland Co., O., where I hope soon to see him. More anon.

D. CALDWELL.

Samuel Hale's Lectures in Ohio.

STRONGSVILLE, O., Dec. 16, 1874.

Mr. Samuel Hale, of York, lectured in the Congregational church of this place on Monday and Tuesday evenings, Dec. 14th and 15th, on the subject of Freemasonry. A fair audience was in attendance. Mr. Hale delivered his lectures with great earnestness and brought before the minds of the audience very forcibly the dangers to which we as a nation are exposed. He read some of the Masonic oaths and spoke of their great profanity, also of the absurdity of a man's professing one religion in the church and practicing an entirely opposite one in the lodge. He remarked that only about one sixteenth of the voters in the United States were Masons, yet he showed clearly how they wielded so much power. Two things he would always stand up for, viz., free speech and the right of petition, using them against secret societies. The great importance of the people becoming fully awake and in earnest against this great sin was urged. The fact that Masons deceived themselves in thinking they have a Christian and a benevolent institution, while they reject Christ and even the very first laws of benevolence was shown.

Mr. Hale advised the young men as they honored their God, their country, and their home, to keep clear of the lodge.

PIKE STATION, Wayne Co., O., Dec. 5, 1874.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

The friends of the anti-secret cause will doubtless be glad to hear from every place where an effort is being made to enlighten the people's minds on the subject of secrecy. A gentleman from York, Medina Co, by the name of Samuel Hale, lectured two nights in this place on the subject of Freemasonry. Mr. Hale is a man of strong mind, speaking with a strong and pleasant voice. After he got through we had some appropriate remarks by Col. Dowd of this place. Three Masons being present some one called on one to speak. After several calls he arose, but all he said worthy of note was that he had been in a rebel lodge. Then one of the others was called on. He got up and with a low growl said something hardly audible; as I sat behind him it sounded to me like the noise a dog makes when he is superintending a pile of old bones. The speeches then ended. Mr. Hale then brought books for sale and tracts to give away. I think much good was accomplished, and I pray God that anti-secret efforts may never relax until every secret organization shall be numbered with the things gone by.

N. MINER.

Notes by the Way from the Illinois Agent.

DEAR BRO K:—At Bloomington I had much difficulty in getting a place to lecture, and found the prevailing influences both in the churches and in the community very strong and bitterly opposed to the discussion of this subject, and yet there are some things full of of hope. There are a few earnest Anti-masons in B. Among them is Father Bohrer, a German, 83 years of age, who devotes his time largely to the distribution of books and tracts on this subject. About a year since he offered a Methodist brother—a Mason—a hundred dollars if he would prove that the name of Christ could be used in the lodge in accordance with the principles of Masonry. This led to the examination of the subject, and about six weeks ago this Methodist brother publicly renounced Freemasonry in a meeting for the promotion of holiness. He also wrote to the lodge of which he was a member, saying, that they were at liberty to expel him if they choose. At the same meeting the editor of the Banner of Holiness, stated that he had been a Royal Arch Mason and that on one occasion he had been requested by the High Priest of the chapter to close the chapter with prayer. He did so, praying in the name of Christ. For this he was rebuked by the High Priest, and told never to do so again. He, too, of course, renounced Masonry, and is cautiously using his paper against it. An evangelist by the name of Brown, is now laboring in the Baptist church in Bloomington. On Thursday last he told the congregation that he had belonged to seven secret societies and had given them all up for Christ's sake; and that if a man was filled with the Holy Spirit he would have no relish for secret societies. Considering that the pastor of this church had some time since preached two sermons in which he specially commended Freemasonry, this was a good deal to say. The United Presbyterians are about to organize a church in Bloomington, and it is hoped that they may successfully hold up a standard of righteousness.

Yours for Christ,

H. H. Hinman.

A Political Suggestion.

Altay, N. Y., Dec. 14, 1874.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

Allow me, through your paper, to suggest (and I alone am responsible for the suggestion) that we, as a national society opposed to Masonry, cordially invite the Republican party to exclude every oath-bound man and his co-adjuters from its future political nominations, hoping it will do so as an act of justice to our national government, and as a means of sure success to the ticket. On such a ticket, we should be a unit, and would work together; for it is well known that opponents of the lodge are nearly all Republicans. We have worked together in full sympathy while elevating the freed slave to his God-given rights. We might again work harmoniously together in restraining those conniving lodges which, in secret garrets, have just hatched their plots to rule, if not to ruin, the nation.

Gerrit Smith, a life-long patriot, warns us that "either the nation or the Democratic party must soon break up." He says the rebel war was a Democrat's rebellion. He says, too, that in 1866, the victims of the Ku-Klux were 2000; and, in '68, three years after the war, some 2,000 more were killed or wounded by these Ku-Klux. And, in 1873, a hundred colored men were murdered at one time,—all in the single State of Louisiana, and done, too, by Democrat members of secret, oath-bound lodges, in order to kill the Republican party. Other lodge-ridden States swell this number. I believe there are now more than a million voters who abhor such murderers, and would, at the very next election, vote an Anti-mason ticket, if they could see a good prospect of immediate success. The general expression is "I don't believe in Masonry, but what can we do? We answer, show us a clean ticket, and we will help you. In union is strength; and this union could, by changing Congressmen, save the land from its present danger and the freed slaves from being returned from bondage or falling, as they yet are, by the assassin's knife and bullet, whetted and moulded in secret, oath-bound lodges. The man who binds his neighbor in a death-penalty to obey every order "handed, sent or thrown" from a secret midnight kian, "murder and treason not accepted," is as far from being a true Republican or a patriot as the blackest night is from the blaze of the mid-day sun.

Please lay these thoughts before all our friends. I hope each will weigh them well and report his views. You have strong men for diplomacy as well as for war. Let such negotiate with our Republican friends. If these friends are true to their own interest, they will meet us half way. For every Republican who votes for this "Secret Empire," (ever clutching at the reins of civil government,) is unwittingly voting power into the hands of Democrats. Let them know that increasing thousands who, like myself, feel every fiber of their hearts beating for true Republicanism, have just ignored its ticket because it was stained with wicked oaths. If that stain remains, scores of thousands will doubtless repudiate it in the near future. If all other tickets remain polluted with blood-chilling oaths, we shall have one that is not; and true patriots and consistent Christians will use it. If ballots are cast for bandits, let corrupted Democrats have all the honor of it. For that honor comes direct, and fully earned, from him who, on condition of being worshiped (and perhaps voting for his lodge) promised to "give all the kingdoms of the earth and the glory of them" as a reward for that worship. And half the voters of this nation have already virtually accepted his terms.

Ancient Mysteries.

Editor of the Cynosure:

I noticed in a late Cynosure that Mr. Hinman, in his able discourse on ancient mysteries, gave expression to the idea that the Eleusinian mysteries celebrated the death and resurrection of Bacchus; but according to the opinion which I have formed on the subject, it was the death and resurrection of Proserpine, daughter of Ceres, that those mysteries involved as their germ.

In Phelp's "History of Secret Societies, Ancient and Modern," it will be seen that under the name and character of Proser ine the seed corn and the process of its lying in the ground for a time, and then germinating into new life, were personified and described in a mythical style. Proserpine was carried off to the infernal regions, but after a time was brought back again, by the power of love, to the light of day; and by her resurrection she furnished nutriment to men and animals. This was the germinal idea of the mystifical worship practiced at Eleusis, and furnished the central principle of the pagan religion of the Greeks.

The Saviour of mankind appears to have alluded to this religious notion of the Greeks when, in reply to the expression of a wish by some Greeks to see him, he said, "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit."

St. Paul also seems to allude to this worship on several occasions, once in 1st Corinthians, chap. xv., verses 36-8, where he calls fools those who believe that the seed corn is quickened without first dying, as the myth of Proserpine would seem to imply, and again, in the eighth chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, where he says, (eleventh verse)—"But if the spirit of him that raised up Jesus Christ from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his spirit that dwelleth in you." That is, as love is believed by the Greeks, and even by you Romans, to have raised up Proserpine from the burial in the earth, and restored her to a new life, to give new life to men, so God, if ye have the germ of a living faith in Christ in your hearts, will raise up you to a new and glorious life.

It must be remembered that St. Paul wrote his epistle to the Romans from Corinth, a Grecian city, rebuilt under the Roman power and situated not far from Eleusis, that great center of mystic worship, where the resurrection of Proserpine from hell was the animating principle; and it will hence be seen that the Apostle from writing near such a locality, would naturally have his thoughts influenced by its inspirations. Indeed, I doubt if much of the Epistles and the Acts can be clearly understood unless by those who entertain a living, zealous dread of mystification-worship, like that of ancient and modern Masonry, as a means of corrupting the Christian religion. The worship of Christ is a religion of holy, inscrutable mysteries, while Mason-worship is a mere ceremonial of man-made mystification.

In short, I am inclined to think, Mr. Editor, that Mr. Hinman is mistaken in supposing that the mystification worshiped at Eleusis, the ancient source of modern Masonry, was the supposed death and resurrection of Bacchus; it was rather that of Proserpine. Bacchic hymns, that is, drunken, maudlin songs, were sung in the worship of Ceres and her daughter Proserpine, just as they are in Masonic lodges at this day; but the only death celebrated on the occasion was probably that of being dead drunk. F. H. C.

[The following letter has been handed us by a friend who thinks it "better than all the bosh in the Cynosure lately" on the Christmas question. We cheerfully give it a place, for it strengthens the position we have taken, that the observance of the day has nothing but human authority. As for the 25th of December, but few intelligent people nowadays will maintain that the following extracts dating from two to four hundred years after Christ are more satisfactory than a scientific demonstration. Chrysostom in the sermon quoted says expressly that the celebration of the 25th of December had been known but ten years, and the custom came from Rome, then already advancing in her Babylonish life.—Ed.

Christmas.

Mr. Cynosure:

It would, perhaps, be a useless labor to attempt to justify the keeping of Christmas to those, who, like some of your correspondents, can see nothing in it but senseless ceremony and mere frivolity; though the great mass of the world recognize it with profound reverence, the great doctrine of the Incarnation, God manifest in the flesh. But it would possibly be well to remind even such, that it is not, as they seem to suppose, so utterly without authority.

The keeping of Christmas is, of course, founded upon the events recorded in the second chapter of St. Luke's Gospel. The time is fixed by the first seven verses, especially the first and second. The taxing or census or enrollment of the second verse, is a clearly ascertained historical fact, referred to by many even by Christian writers, for example by Justin Martyn, 140, who says, "There is a certain village in the land of Judea, distant thirty-five stadia from Jerusalem, as ye can learn from the enrollments completed under Cyrenius your first procurator in Judea. By Tertullian, who says that sus or enrollment of Augustus, as a faithful witness of the Lord's nativity; and again, Christ of the country of Bethlehem, and of the house of David, as among the Romans she is described in the census, Mary from whom Christ is born. By St. Ambrose in his commentary on St. Luke's Gospel. "To show that the census was not of Augustus, but of Christ, the whole world is ordered to be registered." By St. Augustine at a time when as yet the Roman archives were certainly in existence, and accessible to all Roman citizens, John was born on the eighth before the calends of July (June 24th) when the days begin to be diminished; but the Lord was born on the eighth before the calends of January (Dec. 25th), when now the days begin to increase." And in several other instances the same writer refers to the twenty-fifth of December, as the unquestioned date of the Saviour's birth. And by St. Chrysostom in a sermon preached at Antioch, Dec., 25th, 386, who closes his argument as follows: "Whence it is manifest that he was born at the time of this first enrollment, and it is lawful for any one who wishes to know accurately to search the ancient records publicly deposited at Rome and there learn the time of that enrollment.

Few facts of ancient history are better sustained by authentic records than this of the true date of our Saviour's birth, as may be seen more at large in the tenth chapter of the learned introduction of Dr. S. F. Jarvis, form which the above extracts have been made. S. Davis.

A Reply to "Mason" in the Brookfield (Mass.) "News."

A writer in the News, signing himself "Mason" from Globe Village, is under a false impression, viz., that I fear 'to approach the light." It is not light that I fear, but darkness. He says "The way is open," but what a way! The candidate is obliged to take twenty-one solemn oaths before he can see the "light" of a Master Mason; also submit to the degrading ceremony of an undress parade in initiation, which has no need of oaths to keep it secret, for no man is disposed to speak of his own degradation. Allow me to recommend to "Mason" a better way of coming to the light. It comes from one whom he claims to be the patron saint of the order, St. John the Evangelist. He says, speaking of Christ, "In him was life and the life was the light of men. That was the true light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world." It was announced as "glad tidings of great joy," good news to all "without money and without price." Millions have received this light, and what do they say of it? "Come and see" they say to others. They rejoice to spread this light. As they have freely received, they also freely give. The great Author of this light enjoins no blasphemous oaths to keep this light hid from others, but has said "Go ye into all the world," and spread it. Also of his own teachings he said, "In secret have I said nothing." A "Mason" would have us believe that Masonry has changed and that I have failed to sustain my declarations.

Benj. Russell, once Grand Master of the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts, said under oath, "No deviation has been made or can be made at any time from its rules, usages or regulations." Gov. Clinton testifies substantially the same. Hardy's Monitor, a standard Masonic authority, says any attempt to introduce the least innovation, will be reprobated, not by one but by the whole fraternity. Rev. S. Rank, Waverly, Iowa, says, if Morgan's expose is not true, they made a great mistake when they initiated him, for that is the way he was made a Mason. "Mason" says, "we raise the beacon light;" if he had said the "wrecker's light" it would have been nearer the truth. He fears that I shall construe what he has said, "into an invitation to join." I would say, when I was a resident of Globe Village ten or twelve years ago, one of the prominent members of Quinebang Lodge (an intimate friend) spent nearly two hours in trying to convince me that it would be for my interest to join them. It was the interest of the few at the expense of the many. Such is the practical working of the order.

In closing, "Mason" asks, Will you accept? Permit me to answer in the language of Wm. H. Seward in a speech before U. S. Senate, 1855, on secret societies: Sir! before I would place my hand between the hands of other men, in a secret lodge, order, class or council, and bending my knee before them, enter into combination with them for any object, personal or political, good or bad, I would pray God that that hand and that knee might become paralized, and that I might become an object of pity, and even a mockery of my fellow men. Swear, Sir! I, an American citizen, a Christian, swear to submit myself to the guidance and direction of other men; surrendering my judgment to theirs, and my conscience to their keeping? No; no, sir." The institution of Freemasonry ought to be abandoned as one capable of producing much evil, and incapable of producing any good which might not be affected by safe and open means," said Chief Justice Marshall, a Freemason. The testimony of those who have left the body within a year, prove that Masonry has not substantially changed, also the testimony of those who have not left the lodge prove the same thing. I would suggest to "Mason" that the Indian mode of warfare has ceased among civilized people. I will admit, however, that it is in keeping with the institution. Let him come out like a man and show his name as well as his colors, if he is not depending on an institution that he is ashamed of.

A Wrong Date.

Dear Cynosure:—I notice in your columns of the 10th inst. a selected article on "Lisbon," on which this sentence occurs: "But then are Portuguese historians who claim for their capitol a still more remote antiquity, and declare with marvelous precision, that Elisa, a great grandson of Abraham, laid its first stone B. C. 3259." This revelation will puzzle historians considerable, for, according thereto Abraham anti-dates Enoch several hundred years. I suggest this for history's sake: If the founder of Lisbon was really of the family of good old Abraham, and if he performed this important work as many years before Christ, let us call him the great grandfather of Abraham and not his great grandson. This will help the matter a little.

OUR MAIL.

I. Fodder, West Bellville, Ill., writes:

"I think much of the dear Cynosure, and wish you success in battling against such fearful crimes. Justice must sooner or later prevail."

Adelbert Gates, Central Bridge, N. Y., writes:

"I like the paper very much and hope to be able to do something to extend its circulation."

Aaron Phipps, Eagle Harbor, N. Y., writes:

"The Lord has laid his hand heavy upon me. Something over four months I have been on a sick bed. I am now a complete skeleton, boulstered up in my chair for the first time. Some part of the time down by the river waiting for the Boatman. It looked but a step across. My Divine Master in view on the other shore. I find it good for me to have my accounts settled up every night, so that I can take work in the morning in either world; just as seemeth good to my Divine Master. O how precious to have his smiles constantly upon us! Sixty years in his service (though poorly done) have taught me he is not a hard Master. Although the flesh quivers under the rod I can look up and say, thy will not mine be done. Much of the time since my illness my loved one has been wholly prostrate on a sick bed. I hardly knew which would enter the spirit world first. All the way along our good Master has sent kind hands and loving hearts to care for us. Bless his holy name! My difficulty has been rheumatism, chronic diarrhea, heart disease, and neuralgia. O the sleepless nights and weary days! I love the Cynosure. I manage to read or hear it read. Then I scatter them broadcast. I have been working for the Lord a little. While on my bed (as my work is most done I must hurry up) I have got three subscribers by advancing the pay and waiting a more convenient time for it. The Christian can say, O death! where is thy sting?"

J. Lautz, Centreville, Mich., writes:

"I hope that the truths published in the Cynosure from week to week will be as seed sown in good ground. . . My ardent desire is that funds, along with the prayers of the good people, may flow into your treasury, so that you may have a good beginning for the New Year."

O. C. Stoughton, Maquoketa, Ia., writes:

"The work is gaining slowly but surely. Darkness does not begin to break, but it can be felt here yet. Pray for us out here in Iowa."

John Stebbins, Clarksville, Ia., writes:

"I like your excellent paper and wish I could persuade more to take it. I do intend to try and get up a club in Clarksville this winter or by the first of March."

J. H. Purdy, San Francisco, Cal., writes:

"Of the four three-months subscribers I sent you some time since one only consented to renew. I offered to forward the amount, but he said he would do so himself, as he wanted to write. He is both a Mason and an Odd fellow, and, being a Christian, he is disgusted with both. I hoped he would say so in his letter to you, but I find he has not written. I hope he will do so yet and give you a recommendation, but it requires more than ordinary courage to do so in this city where secretism reigns supreme. I have received your petitions to Congress but have got no signers yet. People say the prayers should be granted but withhold their names, doubtless through fear that they will be seen by members of the craft. God speed the day of emacipation from this slavery, and to that end bless your labors and extend the circulation of the Cynosure."

Thomas B. Galloway, Pittsburgh, Ind., writes:

That although his denomination (the United Presbyterian) has lifted up her voice against secret oath-bound societies, it is too seldom that he hears anything from the paper or from the pastors of this denomination on this subject. He says:

"Even ministers handle the subject as they used to do the slavery subject saying, I think it wrong but—but—well, there are good men even ministers belong to it, and even quote the saying of Christ for authority of secrecy: 'See thou tell no man. How Satan can transform himself into an angel of light.' I like the way you speak against Sabbath desecration, Roman Catholicism, and Patrons of Husbandry. May God bless the editor of the Cynosure in this glorious work in pulling down these strongholds of the devil."'

John Glen, Rome, N. Y., writes:

"I am glad to have a paper so able and fearless to war against the anti-Christ of secretism. The Lord bless the Cynosure and all its friends."

Rev. A. Coleman, Janesville, Wis., writes:

"I like the paper much. My prayer is that it may be a success in pulling down this stronghold of Satan (Masonry.)"

John Bell, Warsaw, Penn., writes:

"When first I received your paper, I valued it for exposing secret societies. For that I value it yet. But in what is called the temperance and tobacco column it goes to great extremes. The name you have given to the party and free trade will injure the cause."

We look upon the moderate use of alcoholic liquors and tobacco as the little foxes which spoil the tender grapes of Zion; and say, Take them away. Some do not understand our position concerning free trade. We advocate free trade with such nations as will reciprocate it.

A. S. Riggs, Stockholm, N. Y., asks us to send four petition headings to as many persons' addresses enclosed, and adds:

"Perhaps it would do good to send a few back numbers of the Cynosure to the above addresses as none of them take it, or knew anything of the petitions until I showed them those you sent me. I obtained forty names on Saturday attending a quarterly meeting. The petitions take well among our brethren here (Wesleyan.)"

We hope our friends will do all possible in circulating the petitions. We have just printed fifteen hundred more and hope to get a noble list of petitioners.

Joseph Hoffhiner, Bremen, O., writes:

"We cannot think of dispensing with the Cynosure, but expect to be regular subscribers for it as long as it strikes at the head of this monster evil, secrecy. In this part of Ohio we have many good anti-secrecy men who will stand up for their principles. The United Brethren church is largely represented here and comes down on the powers of darkness with telling force. If you can send to my address about four of those petitions to Congress I can put them into active hands that will do good work."

We hope all who can do so will give those petitions a wide circulation. We will send them to all who write for them.

H. Kumler, Dayton, O., writes:

"You may rest assured that I will do all I can for the Cynosure, because I believe it to be engaged in the most needed reform of our beloved country."

C. J. Millard, Camanche, Ia., writes:

"My health has been such that I have been unable to canvass for it; and now I feel some better I shall try my hand at it as soon as I can."

A. B Copeland, Parnassus, Pa., writes:

I have been a subscriber ever since your paper started, and expect to be as long as I live or until the cause which it advocates triumphs. I was born with anti-secret proclivities and expect to retain them."

Mr. Copeland sends ten new subscribers for a year, and twenty dollars. He certainly will deserve some office in that regiment which is to be composed of such persons as obtain six subscribers for a year to the Cynosure.

Wm. Whitaker, Foxboro, Mass., writes:

"I wish I could do more to enlarge the list of subscribers in this town for I think every man ought to have it. . . . . Some will not have the paper in their house for fear some Mason will see it. The fear of man bringeth a snare, . . but you may set me down as a life subscriber. Pray for us here in Massachusetts."

Nathan Green, Clayville, N. Y., writes:

"I expect to take and circulate the paper while I live if you work on this line. I am depending on you to post me on the doings of our cause in this State."

S. G. Barton, Hopewell Center, N. Y. writes:

"Allow me to say that I am pushing the canvass for the Cynosure, and hope to be able to send you a list before 1875. I would like a few extra copies. I will also forward you an artitcle on the Good Templars, perfectly true in all respects."

W. W. Stringer, Ridge, O., writes:

"Send on your paper, I cannot do without it. It has that "certain sound" that should resound throughout our land. May the Lord bless you in the laborious work which you are engaged in, that darkness may give way and light spring up to spread throughout the United States."

Lesson for January 3, 1875.—Joshua Encouraged.

Joshua i. 1-9. Commit to memory verses 8, 9.

1 Now after the death of Moses the servant of the Lord, it came to pass, that the Lord spake unto Joshua the son of Nun, Moses' minister, saying,

2. Moses my servant is dead; now therefore arise, go over this Jordan, thou, and all this people, unto the land which I do give to them, even to the children of Israel.

3. Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you, as I said unto Moses.

4. From the wilderness and this Lebanon even unto the great river, the river Euphrates, all the land of the Hittites, and unto the great sea toward the going down of the sun, shall be your coast.

5. There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life: as I was with Moses, so I will be with thee: will not fail thee, nor forsake thee.

6. Be strong and of a good courage: for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I swear unto their fathers to give them.

7. Only be thou strong and very courageous, that thou mayest observe to do according to all the law, which Moses my servant commanded thee: turn not from it to the right hand or to the left, that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest.

8. This book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth; but thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and then thou shalt have good success.

9. Have not I commanded thee? Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Thou therefore, my son, be strong in the grace that is in Christ Jesus.—2 Tim. ii. 1.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—The Lord's presence the strength of his servants.

BIBLE READINGS.—[1] Josh. i. 1-9; [2] Num. xxvii. 15-23; [3] Isa. xli. 10-29; [4] Rom. viii. 24-37; [5] Deut. xi. 13-25; [6] Gen. xxxviii. 10-18; [7] Ps. xxxvii. 1-14.

[Place.—Plains of Moab, opposite Jericho. Time.—About 1450 B. C.]

The lesson fittingly introduces the history of, [1] The conquest. [2] The division of the land. Two questions may be considered: [1] Why did Joshua need encouragement? [2] How was he encouraged?

Analysis.—I. Why Joshua needed encouragement? [1] Moses was dead; his experience and character lost to the people. [2] A great war was to be waged, nations of Canaan powerful. [3] The invaders raw, unused to war. II. How he was encouraged? [1] A definite work was given him to do, he could not mistake it. [2] It was not of his choosing. [3] He had been suitably prepared for it under Moses. [4] The presence of God promised him.

Lessons.—The presence of God gives [1] strength, moral power, [2] wisdom, [3] assured protection, [4] success. His presence does not put aside [1] the necessity for our making every effort, and using all proper means, nor [2] the careful study of God's word.

Topics for Study.—Joshua—his character—position—previous service—new duties—need of encouragement—on what grounds—name them in order—what kind of men feel no fear—the encouragements given, secondary—name them—primary meaning of God's "presence"—how Joshua enjoyed it—particulars—instances of direction—of success—needful caution—means to be used—of what kind—Joshua's fidelity—the promise thereon—how fulfilled to Joshua.—*Am. An Address to the People Denominated Christian Brethren.

BY E. B. ROLLINS, 1829.

[Concluded.]

The first reason which I shall assign is, that on close examination of the subject of Freemasonry, and a diligent search of the history of the institution, I found that its pretentions to antiquity were false: and the notion that it was handed down from time immemorial, and that it was established by Solomon as a regular order, or form of administration, to be a fabrication of men, invented to cover the deformities of its barbarous ceremonies with the garb of sanotity. There is no such thing named in the Bible as Freemasonry, neither can the names of its officers, degrees, or ceremonies, be found in that holy book. There are some things used in the ceremonies of Masonry, of which we have an account in the Bible; but they are borrowed or taken without leave from that blessed book, and most of them are used in those degrees which have been instituted within less than half a century. And even those passages of Scripture which are used in the other degrees, appear to have been inserted by those writers who have labored to improve Masonry in modern times. Mr. Preston, who wrote on Masonry in 1738, in which he professed to give a history of the different degrees of Masonry up to the time he wrote, gives no account of more than three degrees. From which it appears evident, that at that time there were no more legitimate degrees in existence. The book called Jachin and Boaz, which was published not long after, professes to disclose the whole of ancient and modern Masonry. I have no doubt but that book contained a true account of Masonry at that time, before it was revised and improved by Mr. Webb and others, in order to deceive the people concerning it. But that book contains no more than three degrees. I am prepared to challenge Masons to show any account of the existence of Royal Arch Chapters, or of any of the degrees conferred in the chapters, till within a half century. These degrees were the most convincing to me of the antiquity and divine origin of the institution; and when I became convinced that these were the invention of modern times, I was left without evidence of the truth of its pretentions. In the lecture on the first degree, a passage of Scripture is introduced from the seventh chapter of Matthew, and made America, in the year 1797. Mr. Webb a part of the lecture. In the second degree, a passage is extracted from Amos, and made a part of the lecture. These passages were not in existence till hundreds of years after Masons pretend these degress were instituted. Mr. Bradley on the third degree mentions a passage which he says is used during the ceremony of initiation. Mr. Preston says nothing of this Scripture. Select portions of Scripture are made to compose a considerable part of the four higher degrees of what is generally called Ancient Masonry. These Scriptures are mostly from the New Testament, which was not in existence till more than a thousand years after they say those degrees were instituted. The first Grand Chapter of which Masons give an account, was organized in says, "Chapters of Royal Arch Masons are held under the authority of Grand Chapters." Of course, then, Chapters did not exist before that time. "These circumstances prove beyond a rational doubt, that the three first degrees have been seriously changed and improved since their origin; and that the four higher degrees have been invented within a few years, and imposed on the world for ancient Masonry.

Mr. Preston, in his treatise on Masonry, published in 1792, pretends to trace the origin of Freemasony from the creation, and supposes it was introduced into England prior to the Roman invasion. But the only proof he produces of this is that there are remains of stupendous works, which must have been executed at a much earlier period than the time of the Romans. What importance can we attach to such evidence as this? Can we suppose that every stupendous work ever built in the world, was built by Freemasons? If so, we might believe that Freemasonry took its rise from the building of the Tower of Babel. The fact is, Masonic authors are unable to produce any substantial evidence of the existence of the order of Freemasonry, till the year of our Lord 674. At or about this time, it appears, that what is called operative masonry commenced. But what is called Speculative Freemasonry never existed till since the year 1717. This appears evident from the following extracts, taken from Rees' Encyclopedia.

"Some have traced the origin of Masonry in general, to the year 674, when the public buildings in the Gothic style, were erected by men in companies, who, as some say, called themselves free, because they were at liberty to work in any part of the kingdom. Others have derived the institution of Freemasons from a combination among the masons, not to work without an advance of wages, when they are summoned from several counties, by writs of Edward III. directed to the sheriffs, to assist in rebuilding and enlarging the Castles, together with the Church and Chapel of Saint George, at Windsor. Accordingly, it is said, that the masons agreed on tokens, &c. by which they might know one another, and to assist one another against being impressed, and not to work unless free, and on their own terms."

Dr. Henry, in his "History," attributes the origin of the Freemason Society in Britain, to the difficulty found in former times, of procuring a sufficient number of workmen to build the multitude of churches, monastaries, and other religious edifices which the superstition of those ages prompted the people to raise. Hence, the masons were generally favored by the popes, and many indulgences were granted in order to augment their number. In times like these we speak of, it may be supposed that such encouragement from the supreme pastors of the church, must have been productive of the most beneficial effects to the fraternity; and hence the origin of the society may be deduced. The doctor quotes in confirmation of this, the words of our author, who was well acquainted with their history and constitution. "The Italians," says he, "with some Greek refugees, and with them French, Germans and Flemmings, joined into a fraternity of architects, procuring papal bulls for their encouragement and their particular privileges; they styled themselves Freemasons, and ranged from one nation to another, as they found churches to be built; their government was regular, and when they fixed near the building in hand, they made a camp of huts. During the reign of Queen Anne, masonry made no considerable progress. It was therefore determined that the privileges of Masonry should not be confined to operative masons, but that people of all professions should be admitted to participate in them, provided, they were regularly approved and initiated into the order." From these accounts of the origin of the institution, it appears that certain men who worked at the occupation of masonry, called themselves Freemasons, because they were at liberty to work where they pleased, in any part of the kingdom, that they combined together under principles of secrecy, to gain an advance of wages, and prevent being impressed, and having probably been acquainted with the system of secret mysteries, which originated among the idolatrous priests in Egypt, they converted the barbarous oaths and ceremonies and the secret signs and tokens to their own use, as the Jacobins did in France, and having invented some morals on the utensils peculiar to their occupation, they formed the order of Freemasonry, and laid the foundation for that illegitimate monster which has deceived its thousands, and excited the wonder of the world.

It seems that this secret combination might have sunk into disrespect, and have gone into oblivion in its infancy, had it not been fostered like the Mahommedan religion, by the peculiar exegencies attending the superstition of those times. But the pressing necessity of procuring workmen of the mason's occupation, to gratify the popish superstition of the people, induced Edward III. to issue writs to them, and failing of success, the Pope undertook to flatter them, by granting them great indulgences, and papal bulls. These circumstances could not fail to inspire in Masons an enthusiastic zeal for their order, and make them popular in the view of others. Hence the cause why the Greek refugees rushed into the fraternity, and ranged from one nation to another to find churches to be built. These circumstances show that the grand pillars of Freemasonry, instead of being "strength and beauty," are gain and promotion. But, with all its boasted advantages, it must have sunk with the rubbish of popery, had it not been changed from an operative to a speculative system, about the year 1717. This measure, together with some improvements that have been made from time to time, by men who were ashamed of its deformities, and who labored to clothe it with a garb of sanctity, by detaching ceremonies and principles from the Bible and ingrafting with its heathenish customs, has prevented its sinking into disrepute, even among its own votaries.

The second reason I shall produce, is, that the institution leads to sacrilege and idolatry.

As long as I believed the institution was of divine origin, I did not view in this light. But the moment I was convinced that it was an invention of men, I could but see that the administration of its obligation, in the name of Almighty God, and the use of ordinances of divine service in its ceremonies, was sacriligeous. And when I was informed that the Koran, the Shastas, and other supposed divine books, were used instead of the Bible, among Mohammedans and heathens, I could but see that its tendency was to draw mankind imperceptibly from the clear light of the Gospel in its simplicity, to the confused darkness and complicated ceremonies of heathenish idolatry. Freemasonry erects its lodges to God among Christians, and to the gods among the heathens, as circumstances require. It rears its altars, and places upon them, the Bible, the Koran and the Shaster in their turn. It has associated men of different religions, and adorned them with imagery. It has appointed its officers, and ascribed to them titles which are more applicable to God than man.

The third reason I shall adduce, is, that the institution cannot be supported by honest measures.

If nothing was revealed concerning it, the very nature of its secrecy involves the necessity of deception.

But the fatal spell is broken, and the people can no longer be deceived by Masonry. The martyrdom of Morgan has awakened the slumbering reason of the people to inquire into its nature and tendency, and a thorough investigation of the subject has clearly shown, that its obligations are neither legally, morally, nor religiously binding upon the enlightened conscience. Hence, hundreds of its votaries, have thrown off its shackles, and have been honest to own the truth, and have boldly witnessed that Morgan's illustration of the three first degrees of Freemasonry, and the obligations of the Royal Arch degrees as disclosed by the Le Roy Convention, are substantially true. Among such men, I feel it a privilege to be numbered, and to unite with them in redeeming the liberties of my country, and in delivering Zion from the influence and corruptions of an intruder, that has crept within her borders and polluted her ministers, deceived her sons and grieved her daughters.

I pray God to pardon my error: and beseech my brethren and friends to overlook my folly in leaving the walls of Zion, to join the conclave of Masonry, like that discovered by Ezekiel, chap. viii. 7–12. And I hope by the grace of God, to be able to redeem the time, and restore the breach, by reformation, and guarding the unwary against its devices, and by persuading them to embrace that which is good and satisfying to the soul.

Yours in the kingdom and patience of Jesus, EDWARD B. BOLLINS.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DEC. 24, 1874.

SHALL WE KEEP HOUSE?—Mr. Carpenter offers a beautiful building, 221 West Madison St., Chicago, to the National Christian Association, provided a fund can be raised sufficient to start a Tract and Book Society to furnish the Sunday-schools and churches of this nation with literature excluding Freemasonry from their fellowship, as a worship of false gods. Shall we accept Mr. Carpenter's proposition and comply with his terms? We now have not a room in the city of Chicago, of our own, in which to meet for consultation and prayer. Our cause needs a home, and a beautiful home is now offered us. What say friends to Mr. Carpenter's proposition? One thing is clear to us: existing Tract Societies never will take up this cause, as they rejected the cause of the slave, till it becomes popular.

REV. ADAM CROOKS.

"KNOW YE NOT THERE IS A PRINCE AND A GREAT MAN FALLEN THIS DAY IN ISRAEL?"

Our beloved brother Crooks is gone over the silent river before us. We shall not attempt his biography. This will be given in due time. He was born of unpretending parents in the still and quiet country. The spirit of God found and took possession of him. But a youth, he went with the Wesleyan Methodist movement, which by seceding from and compelling the M. E. church to take ground against slavery, was, at one time, the pivot on which turned the nation's destiny.

Young Crooks went, with McBride and one or two others, to North Carolina as conference missionary to the slave States. They struck for the mountain districts, and in a few years a multitude of the mountain peasants flocked to Christ. Every man of them had a rifle and a vote. The lynx-eyed slave power, seeing that if the Switzerland of America, that mountain ridge which includes the back counties of Georgia, the Carolinas, Tennesee and Kentucky, was abolitionized, their territory would be divided, and their scepter broken, moved promptly to squelch the mission. They persecuted and imprisoned Crooks and his associates and drove them back to the North.

Slavery finally fell, and the legion of devils who were cast out and left without occupation fell into the lodge, which rapidly required its lost power in the whole country North and South. Some of the Wesleyan leaders had been Freemasons, and they returned like the dog to his vomit and the sow to her mire. This brought Mr. Crooks to the front. Simple, unobtrusive, and perfectly sincere, he has been the Atlas of the Wesleyan denomination ever since. The men who came off from the M. E. church for the sake of being leaders of the Wesleyans, having neither the courage, or capacity, or self-denial which the occasion required, forsook their position and their principles and fled, some to the M. E. church, and others to the Protestant Methodists. Mr. Crooks took the helm. As was said of Gen. Hamilton, "He touched the dead carcass of the public credit and it stood up." He restored the dilapidated Book Room at Syracuse. The paper (Wesleyan) became self-sustaining. The General Conference, sustained by his influence, stood the grapple with the lodge and gave but fourteen votes for a retreat on that issue, fundamental to every other. Without a particle of sectarian feeling, he saved his denomination. He was a true New Testament bishop without either the human prerogative or the name. He was almost ready to commence the erection of a new National Publishing House at Syracuse; and he had drawn around him godly and good men who are opposed to the world's evils, and who it is hoped will carry to completion his designs. Would God that brother Roberts, of the Free Methodist church, might be able to coalesce with the Wesleyan; and those two bodies, so nearly identical, unite their forces and quadruple their moral power to force the Methodist church as once before into measures of reform! Be that as pleases God. They are both doing good work for Christ.

The constitution of brother Crooks might have sustained his life for years. But battered by hardships. persecution, and imprisonment, it gave way, and his sun is gone down while it was yet day.

"Thou hast fallen in thy armor
Thou beloved of the Lord;
With thy last breath crying 'Onward,'
And thy hand upon the sword.
And we'll think of thee, O brother,
In the trials yet to come,
In the shadow of the prison
Or in cruel martyrdom."

Mr. Crooks originated the idea and the name, "The United Churches of Christ," by which he proposed to unite those who worship Christ, and exclude those who worship Satan in lodge or pagoda, in spirit-circle or club. Let us take up the word from the lips of our brother, and make it our banner—"THE UNITED CHURCHES OF CHRIST." And under this banner, while each denomination does its business in its own way, let us bring God's children out from "fellowship" with "the unfruitful works of darkness." Let us thus unite in one all who worship Christ, and exclude those who do not, cannot worship him, because they believe him to be only a man, having sins of his own, and so disqualified to save; or, what is equivalent, who have no belief at all, and so must "be damned."

And let us, too, if not form a political party, vote simply as "Americans" against those secret orders which are the curse and dry-rot of everything American. "Know ye not that there is a Prince and a great man fallen this day in Israel?"

A KEYSTONE CARRIED OFF.

Darkest corners are often in lightest places. The devil is always busy in a true revival. In our reform the same holds true; where there is most discussion and the lodge is best understood, there it is often most desperate and cunning. In the days of 1826-31 when the lodge doors were all thrown open, and the "most sacred" recesses trodden by "profane" feet, there still lurked a desperate few, who, with Diabolonian subtlety crouched, survived, and brought back the lodge. A likeness to those times has existed at Wheaton. Everybody knew or was supposed to know all the hideousness and foolishness of Masonry, and Wheaton Lodge, No. 269, nearly died from shame and indifference. A few funerals served to keep it alive, until during the past summer a lodge missionary from this city, who trains with the Oriental Consistory of Sublime Princes of the Royal Secret, 32 ddegree, came to the rescue. Severe "button-holing" got the institution into working order—all very quietly. A lodge of Knights of Pythias was proposed, but for some reason did not take. A Royal Arch Chapter came next, and an order for the assembling of the same, promulgated in the local and Chicago papers. This called out an enthusiastic meeting in the Wesleyan church last Friday evening. The building was over-full, and the lodge was also well represented.

Mr. E. B. Thompson was called to the chair and Rev. Mr. Van Doren, of Nora, Ill., Wesleyan conference evangelist, offered prayer. Rev. W. E. Pinkney, one of the board of directors of the National Association, addressed the meeting on the privilege and duty of the citizens of Wheaton to discuss the merits and demerits of Chapter Masonry. and the proposition to establish the Royal Arch degree in the community. He gave an explanation of the chapter from Mackey and Bernard, and proved from these authorities the evil influences flowing from such a source.

He was followed by Dr. J. B. Walker who spoke of the efforts of the lodge to get in young men from the respectable families of the town which had been partly successful. The master of an Aurora lodge told him, recently, that were good men out of the lodge it would go down immediately. Christianity is better than any or the best of its members, while the lodge is worse than the worst of those who attend it. The young men of Wheaton who have connected themselves with the Masonic society here are less useful, less intelligent, less virtuous, than if they had remained away. He also quoted and commented with great clearness and force on the opinions of eminent statesmen, jurists and divines against Freemasonry. The testimony of the eminent Bishop Hamline, of the Methodist Episcopal church, at one time a Mason, was especially noticed for the benefit of the brethren of that church, some of whom are caught in the snare.

As he closed the chairman gave a special invitation to members of the lodge present to occupy the time in defense of their order, if any could be made against the heavy charges brought against it. None thought the lodge worth defending, showing that their opinion of its merits was very small, or that for the time conscience and sense had the better of prejudice on this subject. So Mr. Campbell, pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, was called on, who attempted to walk on the narrow edge of neutrality in the following manner; before the meeting closed it seemed nearly as uncomfortable as Beecher's famous position. He said he found himself in a new world. He saw and heard strange things. He had lived long in Massachusetts, where they had some regard for intelligence, but had heard nothing on this subject; no word either for or against Masonry. Perhaps the reason for this ignorance was owing to the fogs from the adjacent ocean beclouding the perceptions of the people of the Old Commonwealth. He believed every man had a right to his own conscience; to his own judgment; to spend his money as he pleased provided he did not infringe on the rights of his neighbors. He was not a Mason, nor did he take any stock in the opposition. No government on earth, he said, except a Roman Catholic, would enact a statute against secret socieiies. For hobby-riders he had little but contempt. They were chasing a balloon. He would say to them, chase away if you want to. Its my business not yours how I spend my money. He referred to the power and extent of the Methodist church in this country. It has more colleges, churches and members than any other Christian body. Eminent members of that church had told him Masonry was a good institution; its principles were all right. The institution or the church that does not make men better ought not to exist. He would kick it out. If he saw sin he struck it, no matter whom it might offend. If his church could not endure it he could work elsewhere. If he thought Masonry was wrong he would fight it; but this was a new subject to him. Although it had been brought to his notice since living in Wheaton several times, he had not cared to investigate it.

At the close of his desultory remarks, an invitation was again given to Masons, and then to any person present to continue the discussion. Prof. C. A. Blanchard had been requested by the committee who arranged the meeting to speak, and the chairman asked him to come forward. He held up the propositions of the preceding speaker, and courteously, but in a forcible manner, pointed out their fallacy: and followed with a powerful argument on the case, arraigning the lodge for folly, hypocrisy and conspiracy against the public weal.

The meeting had a marked effect on the audience and community, and furnished a leading topic; that it will have the effect of thwarting the "chapter" movement we do not prophesy. The leaders in that movement are persons who sue teachers for maintaining order in their schools and ride about the county on the Sabbath to look after the interests of their institution. Where it is concerned no argument but self-interest has any effect on such men. But the nature and the work of the Royal Arch degree is before the public. Except to plot against community, there is no use of its establishment. "Othello's occupation's gone." The keystone is siezed away and the structure is worthless.

NOTES.

—The act of Congress establishing the Masonic Hall Association appears on this page through the kindness of Gen. J. W. Phelps, of Battleboro', Vt. An act more foully staining the record of our national body than the "salary grab," which an outraged people forced it to repeal. Let every American show an equal zeal in this case. The petition now in circulation calls for the rescinding of this act.

—The report of the meeting of the Boston Convention for Constitutional reform held last week is given in the following despatch:

"At the Convention in Boston of New England friends of the movement to secure a religious amendment to the Constitution of the United States, there were between 200 and 300 delegates present. Charles G. Nazro was chosen President; and among the Vice Presidents were Judge E. H. Bennett of Boston University, Drs. Webb and Miner, President Cummins of Wesleyan University, and Dr. Dows Clarke. A series of resolutions were adopted setting forth the grounds for u ging the recognition of God in the Constitution."

—Mr. Samuel Pearce, a veteran of the Morgan days died last week on Monday in this city at the age of 83 years. Mr. Pearce was one of the orlginal seceders of the Leory Convention, and he was accustomed to point with honest pride to his name in the roll of that great meeting. His advanced age and feeble health prevented very active co-operation in the work in this city, but he was present at the meeting to arrange for the Illinois State Convention held in Farwell Hall in October. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, and came to this city in 1864 and for some years was an active and influential citizen, as are his two remaining sons, one of whom is President of the Third National Bank, and the other a prominent real estate dealer.

—The death of Rev. Adam Crooks, of the Wesleyan church, is noted elsewhere. The Wesleyan of Dec. 16th says of his sickness since his return to Syracuse in the fall after the conferences up to Dec. 14th: "He has attended to some business and correspondence, and of course carrying burdens on his heart for the connection which his weakness would not allow him to lift by performing. The week he wrote his long letter of the Minnesota and Wisconsin Conferences, and the two dedications, he had a slight pull back, and the week he wrote the Prospectus for 1875 he had another. Last week, from over-work and taking cold, he had a severe attack of billious colic, followed by a full appearance of typhoid fever. Wednesday night and Thursday, the day of our Missionary Board meeting, he was lying in an unconscious state. The Board meeting was adjourned one week. His physician, Dr. H. V. Miller of this city, thinks him apparently better. He is conscious and cheerful. The Doctor reports to-day, (Monday) that the typhoid symptoms have subsided and he now has the billious fever. Last Friday he had a long, hard chill, but since then he has had no more chills, nor a very high fever. The liver is the seat of the disease. His symptoms are generally better than they were two or three days ago, but he is still in a dangerous condition." Before the above came to its readers Bro. Crooks was dead. He passed away on Tuesday Dec. 15th.

The Home Circle.

The Hardest Time of All.

There are days of deepest sorrow
In the season of our life;
There are wild, despairing moments,
There are hours of mental strife.
There are times of stony anguish,
When the tears refuse to fall;
But the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

Youth and love are oft impatient,
Seeking things beyond their reach;
And the heart grows sick with hoping,
Ere it learns what life can teach.
For before the fruit be gathered,
We must see the blossoms fall;
And the waiting time, my sisters,
Is the hardest time of all.

Loving once, and loving ever.
It is sad to watch for years,
For the light whose fitful shining
Makes a rainbow of our tears.
It is sad to count at morning
All the hours to evenfall;
Oh, the waiting time my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

We can bear the heat of conflict,
Through the sudden, crushing blow,
Beating back our gathered forces,
For a moment lay us low,
We may rise again beneath it,
None the weaker for our fall;
But the waiting time, my sisters,
Is the hardest time of all.

For it wears the eager spirit,
As the salt waves wears the stone:
And Hope's gorgeous garb grows thread-bare,
Till its brightest tints are gone.
Then amid youth's radiant tresses,
Silent snows begin to fall:
Oh, the waiting time, my brothers,
Is the hardest time of all.

Yet at last we learn the lesson,
That God knoweth what is best,
And a silent resignation
Makes the spirit calm and blest.
For, perchance a day is coming,
For the changes of our fate,
When our hearts will thank him meekly,
That he taught us how to wait.

Defending Self.

About as poor business as a Christian man can ordinarily be engaged in, is defending his character, and trying to set himself right before the world. In nine cases out of ten, 'the world' dosen't care three ha'pence for either accusations or defense, and most of them never would have known that he was accused if he had not told them; and then they are quite likely to conclude that he feels guilty or he would not be so anxious to defend himself.

Defend yourself? Does your "self" deserve any defending? Can you make a defense that would stand before the glance of your Maker? Would not a confession be more in order than a defense? Are you ready to make that? If not, perhaps you had better wait in silence for some further light, and "deny self" rather than defend it.

You are lied about, are you? and you think this is a hardship; but what if all men say of you were true?—would not that be harder still? Is not the true part the worst to bear? On the whole, would you not rather have them tell all the lies they do tell, than have them know and tell the whole and exact truth regarding you? Would not the truth cut deeper where the lie only scratches? And then if it were truth, you could not deny it; but lies you can contradict with a good conscience. On the whole is it not probable that you get off easier at the devil's hands with all his lying, than you would at the Lord's, provided he should deal with you in truth and according to your just deserts?

What then? Bow before the Lord. Sit in dust and ashes at his feet. Humble yourself under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time. Against wrong and slander your best defense is the living God, and he will defend everything that deserves defending, in his own good time. Cast all your care on him. Seek to be right, rather than to seem right. Prize character more than reputation, and the favor of God more than the honor that cometh from men. Lies are a short-lived brood. Truth lives. Falsehood may make a quick start, but truth is sure to come in ahead at the end of the race. You can often make a new character by upright living in less time than you can mend or defend an old one when it is assailed.

Keep at your work, and be content with your lowly lot and your limited sphere. Wait patiently the Master's call to come up higher, and see to it that no ardent zeal for self-justification takes you away from the appointed work to which God has directed your hands. We are very unprofitable servants at the best, and as has been well said, "When it is all over, and our feet will run no more, and our hands are helpless, and we have scarcely strength to murmer a last prayer, then we shall see that, instead of needing a larger field, we have left untilled many corners of our single acre, and that none of it is fit for our Master's eye were it not for the softening shadows of the cross."

Keep beneath the shadow of the cross, and count all sorrow, reproach, falsehood, and injury done you for Christ's name and sake, as your portion of joint suffering with him who bled for you on Calvary, and who shall yet call each suffering saint to sit down with him upon his throne. His wisdom superintends our sorrows; his love permits our tears. He maketh the wrath of man to praise him, and he loves and succors every tempted soul. He does not send us forth in untried armor, or untrodden ways, or to fight with unknown foes. He has gone before us all the way. He has fought our battles and conquered our enemies. Every arrow of Satan has been blunted against his adamantine shield. Every fiery dart has been quenched by him. Satan has nothing new to bring; he fights with broken weapons and blunted arrows, and on a field where he was met and routed long ago. And by whom? By the very Captain of our Salvation, who was made perfect through our suffering; who was tempted in all points like as we are yet without sin; and who calls us to this conflict, and will not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear, but will with the temptation provide a way of escape;—and who giveth us victory and "redemption through his blood."

Let us then leave our cares and sorrows to his love and power, and fling to the winds our fears, and doubts, and sad repinings. Let us be strong in the Lord, and in the power of his might. Let us meditate upon Christ, and learn in what way he met such enemies and overcame them. Let us make him our trust, and call upon him in the hour of need. "Beloved, think it not strange concerning the fiery trial which is to try you, as though some strange thing had happened unto you: but rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings; that, when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye; for the spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you: on their part he is evil spoken of, but on your part he is glorified. But let none of you suffer as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil doer, or as a busybody in other man's matters. Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed: but let him glorify God on this behalf." 1 Pet.iv. 12,–16.—The Christian.

Religious Education.

Now, there are several lessons, I think, comes to us on this subject. In the first place, I am satisfied that the church is not looking sufficiently for the conversion of the children of the church and of the world. There are those who delight in the conversion of persons of mature age, and rather speak lightly of the conversion of a little child. And when our children come to the altar of prayer we are rather disposed to thing it is a momentary matter, an effervescent thing with them. We are willing perhaps to indulge them, but have scarcely any idea of their conversion.

My friends, this is a great mistake. The children can come to Christ, and he is willing to take them in his arms, and I am satisfied that the day is coming when in our church, and in all the churches of the world, we shall look chiefly to the conversion of childhood, and as a comparatively rare instance to the conversion of those in maturer years. The strength of the church will be put on the great work of bringing the children early to Christ, saving the precious lambs, bending their wills early, impregnating their minds with divine truth from the very beginning, and seeing God's work manifesting itself in them while they are like plants around our table. Then they grow up beautiful Christians, stable Christians, developed Christians, working Christians, loving Christians. This is what we long to see.

With this idea we should not merely look at our own families and the church services for the children, but we should also ask, What is to become of the children who are on the street? We should do more for them in mission schools; we should go out after them. There is a great responsibility—a great responsibility resting upon us; and through childhood we may ofttimes be doing more for humanity.

In addition to this, if it is true that we ought to give our children such training as shall make them most efficient in doing good to the world, we should supplement the education they receive in public schools by the higher education which those schools may not give.

Some of the countries, in emancipating their slaves, simply decreed that all the children born after a certain day should be free. The process seemed slow, yet it came. This was the way in this State, and in New York and Pennsylvania. The same principle may be with Christianity; if we could secure all the children born after to-day to be Christ's children, if all should be rightly educated, you and I might not live to see it on earth; but though we should not see it here, we might look down from heaven and see it; and these children should come to glory after us, and we should see them as they come home to glory. The world would be redeemed.—Bishop Simpson.

Embalming among the Egyptians.

The Egyptians, however, carried their process to perfection by introducing antiseptics into the vacated interiors of their dead, thus embalming in their catacombs, it is estimated, not less than 4,000,000,000 persons. Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, especially the former, have minutely explained the method of preservation, and from them we learn that it was a regular trade. The embalmers removed the brain and the intestines, supplying the emptiness with myrrh, cassia, and other spices; and then placed the body in natron for seventy days. Subsequently it was carefully laved and wrapped with bandages of fine linen smeared with gum, and put in a wooden case shaped after the human figure. There were other modes of embalming less expensive, the rate varying from $1800 to $400 in our currency, which was so much money in those days that we cannot now see how Egyptians of the ordinary class could possibly afford to die. They doubtless lived longer than they would have done otherwise, prompted by a prudent economy to avoid the extravagance of burial as long as possible.

The cheapest way of embalming, adopted usually by the poor, was to free the abdomen of the intestines by means of a clyster—commonly the oil of cedar-tree—and let the body lie in natron until the body was impregnated. Recent investigations indicate that heat must have been applied to the corpses after they have been filled with some bituminous substance, and creosote generated and defused through all the tissues. The reason that heat was not mentioned by the ancient authorities is supposed to be their desire to keep the process secret and enhance the dignity and mystery of the art.

Embalming is still employed. The means adopted by Chaussier and others have been to eviscerate the body and keep it constantly saturated with protochloride of mercury. The salt, combined with the flesh, not only gives it firmness, but renders it incorruptible either by internal or external agencies. The injection into the veins of a concentrated solution of sulphate of alumina, or of chlorid of mercury and wood-vinegar, or of zinc, has been found very affective not only for anatomical purposes, but also for embalming.

We might attain to the preservative excellence of the Egyptians were we so minded; but as embalming, except for temporary convenience, is not deemed desirable with us, and forms no part of our theological system, we have no ambition to rival them in mummification. Our sepulchral vanity manifests itself in grandiloquent epitaphs and sculptured monuments, instead of in dessicated carcass and pigmental disguises of death. The aesthetic element alone would prevent us from imitating the dwellers on the Nile, who made death more hideous to the eye than it would be to the supremest superstition.—Harper's Magazine.

The Seen and the Unseen.

If a man be confined simply to material studies, he tends to become a materialist. And one of the reasons why men who study only natural science are liable to be skeptical is that they fix their thoughts wholly on the seen. They are analyzing flowers and minerals, and examining rocks and classifying fossils, and their whole thought is on the visible—there is so much beauty in the affinities, such a regular gradation in creation, such an expansion of ideas from the very lowest forms to the very highest, such a procession of ages in development. Take the machinery of the vast heavens, and the fact that there has evidently been the contraction and aggregation of matter, and that that process may even be going on to-day, and this thought turns the man to the physical or material. But where under his education he is led also to consider that the unseen was necessary, that matter could not be its own former, that there must be spirit, mind, thought that these beautiful laws he examines must be the thoughts of a mind, and a great mind, he will be saved from this tendency to a skepticism; and as he examines matter his mind will expand and he will think of the Creator of matter, and pass up from nature toward nature's God.—Bishop Simpson.

THE LAW OF THE SABBATH.—The Old Testament makes the following occupations unlawful on the Sabbath. Sowing and reaping (Ex. xxxiv: 21); pressing grapes and bearing burdens of all kinds (Neh. xiii: 15: Jeh. xvii: 21); holding of markets and all kinds of trade (Neh. xiii: 15; Amos viii: 5); gathering wood and kindling a fire for cooking (Ex. xxxv: 3; Num. xv: 32;). The Sabbath was to be a day of enjoyment like other festivals (Isa. lviii: 13; Hos. ii: 11). According to the Pharisees, it was forbidden to pluck an ear of corn and rub out the grains to satisfy hunger in passing through a cornfield (Matt. xii: 2); or to relieve the sick (Matt. xii: 10; Luke xiii: 14). It was, however, permitted to lead an ox or an ass to water, or to lift out an animal that had fallen into a pit (Matt. xii: 11; Luke xv: 5); to administer circumcision, if the eighth day after the birth of a child fell on the Sabbath (John vii: 22); and to invite guests to a social meal (Luke xiv: 1). According to rabbinical authorities, it was forbidden to travel more than 2,000 cubits on the Sabbath; to kill the most offensive kinds of vermin; to write two letters of the alphabet; to use a wooden leg or a crutch; to carry a purse or a smelling bottle; to wear a high headdress or a false tooth.—Selected.

The Mennonites.

The Mennonites are a denomination of Baptists which originated in the sixteenth century. They take their name from Menno Simonis, who is generally claimed as the founder of the church, but not without dispute with some parties. Menno Simonis was born in Friesland toward the close of the fifteenth century, and was at first a Catholic priest. Doubts about transubstantiation and other doctrines of the Roman Catholic church led him to the writings of Luther; but he never fully abandoned his Catholic faith until he witnessed the execution of one Sicke Snyder, who was put to death for being re-baptized, and an Ana-baptist movement was put down by force, in which Menno's brother was killed. He wrote several works, but his principal one was the "Fundamental Book of the True Christian Faith." His works was all written in the Dutch language, and are said to evince much learning and a sincere piety. He suffered much from persecution, and his life was one of undying devotion to what he believed to be the true Christianity, for which he experienced great hardships.

The Mennonites were most numerous in Holland in the seventeenth and eighteenth century, owing to the immigration of fugitives from Germany and Switzerland. Originally their preachers were unlearned men; but during the last century they have done much for education, and have a well educated ministry, some of them among the most distinguished theologians of Holland. They sustained some foreign missions. In Germany they were numerous during the seventeenth century, and in Moravia alone they were computed at 70,000; but persecution reduced them, and they never secured full civil rights in Germany, until the revolution of 1857, when H. Von Beherath, one of the most distinguished Mennonites, became minister of Finance of the German Empire.

The American Mennonites settled in eastern Pennsylvania shortly before 1700, the immigrants coming in parties from 1683 onward. They were originally mostly in the counties of Lancaster and Chester, but subsequently spread over nearly the whole State, and have now many congregations in Maryland, Ohio, New York, Indiana, and some in Canada. They have several divisions of them. One is called Reform Mennonites. Another body of very rigid people are called Omish or Amish, from Jacob Amon, their leader, a Swiss preacher. Some of them are called Hooker Mennonites, because they wear hooks on their coats instead of buttons. In politics the American Mennonites are generally Republicans in sentiment, believing in the right of the people to conduct the Government in their own ways, but they are by no means politicians, and indeed too generally stay away from the polls. We do no think their church polity restricts them in any manner from participation in the affairs of State, but like the Quakers, they seldom rally except upon great emergencies, or what seems so to them. When urged by politicians, as they always are, their usual reply is that the Lord will bring about all things in his own good way; but when a body of them does rally, their votes generally tell on the side which they think has selected the best men. They generally stand by each other, and the party which has the shrewdness to put a good Mennonite on its ticket is apt to be remembered. They are essentially a quiet, good people.

The Mennonites are not Quakers, as has been stated, and this error arises probably from the fact that they are non-residents, and compelled to leave Russia principally because they will not bear arms. In doctrine and usage they agree generally with the Baptists, but agree with the Quakers in their utter aversion to oaths, and to capital punishment, which they regard as inconsistent with the spirit of Christianity. They differ from other Baptists in tolerating sprinkling, though they do baptize by immersion. They observe the ordinance of feet washing, and prohibit their members from intermarrying with other denominations, and persons of no denomination.—Selected.

A PLAIN TALK.—An old-fashioned woman, writing in the Watchman and Reflector speaks thus of some of our young seminary girls: "I have found in the class-room, that the girls with the most on the outside of their heads, have the least inside. Last summer I heard a fashionable young lady read her graduating essay, earnestly demanding a 'wider sphere for women,' while her chest was so narrowed by artificial means that she could hardly read her essay. She evidently thought this whole world a 'pent up Utica' that was confining her powers; but all the poor girl needed was sufficient strength and independence of character to free herself from the thraldom of fashion, and go to work in an earnest way to bring nearer to Christ the world she had found so sadly out of order. Some of you, my dear girls, may be filled with 'infinite longings' for a 'career.' 'Let me tell you that what our sex most need at present is women who, unembarrassed by fashionable drapery, can walk a few miles without being tired—women whose thinking powers are not injured, who find a 'career' in earnestly doing her Master's work, however homely."—The Christian.

The hope of the church is in revivals; and the fairest hope of revivals is in teaching and preaching the Gospel to the young. If I were to turn evangelist, I would enter the field. Let every pastor who desponds over the effect of his ministry upon the world-hardened minds turn to the lambs of the flock. Pentecost will begin for him there. Let our Sunday-school teachers seek immediately and explicity, not the entertainment or instruction of their charge, but their conversion; and the question of the spiritual state of the church, the sancity of home-life, the peace and order of society, and the supply of Christian ministers and Christian missionaries are all answered in words of hope and promise.—*A. Calling.

BY A. S. FISK.

Two little girls one summer day
Had met as usual for a play,
'Twas blue-eyed Clare, and brown-eyed May,

"I'll tell you what," says la belle Clare,
"I'm tired of all the dolls there are
Lets make their beds up in this chair;

And then let's get our hats and go
Out calling as the ladies do,
I think that would be nice; don't you?"

Said thoughtful little lady May,
"I don't object to what you say;
I'll bring the hats without delay;

But then I don't know where to call,
I go with grandma if at all."
"O well," said Clare, "we'll visit all."

And far adown the village street
They rang the bell their friends to greet;
Politely entered; took a seat:

Chatted awhile; then rose to go—
They must be getting on you know.
And so they went the village through.

They rang the bell at every door,
Called on the rich, nor scorned the poor,
Nor slighted those unknown before;

Until at last at close of day,
Clare's papa frightened by delay
At little Flo's found Clare and May.

The Boy Astronomer.

The first transit of Venus ever seen by a human eye was predicted by a boy, and was observed by that boy just as he reached the age of manhood. His name was Jeremiah Horrox. We have a somewhat worderful story to tell you about this boy.

He lived in an obscure village near Liverpool, England. He was a lover of books of science, and before he reached the age of eighteen he had mastered the astronomical knowledge of the day. He studied the problems of Kepler, and he made the discovery that the tables of Kepler indicated the near approach of the period of the transit of Venus across the sun's center. This was about the year 1635.

Often on midsummer nights the boy Horrox might have been seen in the fields watching the planet Venus. The desire sprung up within him to see the transit of the beautiful planet across the disk of the sun, for it was a sight that no eye had ever seen, and one that would tend to solve some of the greatest problems ever presented to the mind of an astronomer. So the boy began to examine the astronomical tables of Kepler, and by their aid endeavored to demonstrate at what time the next transit would occur. He found an error in the tables, and then he, being the first of all astronomers to make the precise calculation, discovered the exact date when the next transit would take place.

He told his secret to one intimate friend, a boy who, like himself, loved science. The young astronomer then awaited the event which he had predicted for a number of years, never seeing the loved planet in the shaded evening sky without dreaming of the day when the transit should fulfill the beautiful vision he carried continually in his mind.

The memorable year came at last—1639. The predicted day of the transit came too, at the end of the year. It was Sunday. It found Horrox, the boy astronomer, now just past twenty years of age, intently watching a sheet of paper in a private room, on which lay the sun's reflected image. Over this reflection of the sun's disc on the paper he expected, moment after moment, to see the planet pass like a moving spot or a shadow.

Suddenly, the church bells rang. He was a very religious youth, and was accustomed to heed the church bells as a call from heaven. The paper still was spotless; no shadow broke the outer edge of the sun's luminous circle.

Still the church bells rang. Should he go? A cloud might hide the sun before his return, and the expected disclosure be lost for a century.

But Horrox said to himself: "I must not neglect the worship of the Creator to see the wonderful things the Creator has made."

So he left the reflected image of the sun on the paper, and went to the sanctuary.

When he returned from the service, he hurried to the room. The sun was still shining, and there, like a shadow on the bright circle on the paper, was the image of the planet Venus! It crept slowly along the bright center like the finger of the Invisible. Then the boy astronomer knew that the great problems of astronomy were correct, and the thought filled his pure heart with religious joy.

Horrox died at the age of twenty-two. Nearly one hundred and thirty years afterward, Venus was again seen crossing the sun. The whole astronomical world was then interested in the event, and expeditions of observation were fitted out by the principal European Governments. It was observed in this country by David Rittenhouse, who fainted when he saw the vision.—Hezekiah Butterworth.

Begin Early.

We are advocates for the early initiation of girls into the routine of domestic life. A very little child may help mother in many ways that are as pleasant and no more fatiguing than play; and every girl at nine or ten years of age should be accustomed to some regular share of household duties, and feel responsible for the manner in which things are done—such as mending and making her own plain clothes, with many other home occupations. After twelve years of age, girls should begin to take turns in superintending the household, keeping an account of weekly expenses, and cooking pies, puddings, &c. To learn anything effectually they should actually do these things themselves.

We know a little girl in a Western State who took the premium at the State Fair for the best bread made by a girl under thirteen years of age; and also the premium for the best bread made by any person.

We wonder how many of the young girls who read this paper can make good bread, and are little house-keepers?—Ex.

—Ostentatious charity is one of the standard temptations of the human nature.

Religious Intelligence.

—A revival is in progress in Wesley Chapel, Washington. About seventy have professed change of heart.

—Rev. Washington Gladden, for many years connected with the Independent, has left that journal and will re-enter the ministry.

—The consecration of Rev. Dr. Garrett as missionary bishop to northern Texas took place on Sunday in Omaha.

—An Episcopal church of decided Protestant stamp has been erected in Rome. The effect on the ritualistic tendences of that church at large has been good, —Rev. Robert E. Patterson, until lately, and for many years pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of this city, was installed as professor in the Presbyterian Theological Seminary last week.

—Rev. John Gordon, after several years successful pastorate in a Baptist church in the western part of Chicago, has resigned. The beginning of his trouble was in the scandalous Florence McCarthy case nearly a year since.

—The vote of the Presbyteries on the overture of the Presbyterian General Assembly respecting the limited term service of the eldership has been, so far, twenty-one in favor to nine against.

A very successful revival is in progress in Halifax, N. S., Rev. A. B. Earl, the Baptist revivalist, being at work there, and hundreds of conversions are reported.

—During the past fifty years the Lutheran church in America, has increased from 178 ministers, 900 congregations, and 100,000 communicants, to 2,568 ministers, 4 639 congregations, and 561,372 communicants.

—Rev. S. H. Allen, formerly pastor of the Congregational church at Windsor Locks, has gone over to the Catholics. He has recently taken priests orders and is to have charge of the congregation of that denomination in Enfield, Conn.

—The Methodist church has appropriated for this year's missionary work, $700,000, which goes to home and foreign missions both. They allowed an increase of funds to the fields in Mexico, making a total used by their missions in that State of $18,500. For church extension $144,000 have been allowed.

—A correspondent of the Interior, says that Mr. Hammond's labors in Galesburg have been remarkably blessed of God for the conversion of souls and the awakening of Christians. Every evening the Opera House has been crowded by a deeply interested audience. The children of the Sabbath-schools have been especially blessed. A large number of all ages seem to have found Christ to be precious to them. All evangelical denominations are working in the most delightful harmony and helping on this blessed work. The awakening has extended to Knox College and Seminary. Many students who before were indifferent and some even who were scoffers have been brought under deep conviction of sin and led to a rejoicing faith in Christ. Among the converts there is a markable spirit of earnestness and de-devotion. The class work has been almost entirely suspended for some days. Great hopes are entertained that before the end of these special services the greater part if not the whole of the students in the Institution will have made an open profession of their faith in Christ.

—The Chicago Tribune in an editorial on church fairs has the following sensible remarks:

"The mothers of the household are then called upon to do drudgery which they would resent at home, and the daughters are thrown as "pretty waiter-girls" into a familiar companionship with men whom they would not receive in their own parlors. Many a husband and father has protested, secretly or openly, against a system which makes a drudge of his wife or a flirt of his daughter, only that his own comfort may be neglected at home. Many a woman has found a sick bed by the overwork or unaccustomed exposure incurred in these church or charity dinners. And, after all is done, the result is found to be a comparatively unproductive investment of material, time, and money. There is not one man in ten who contributes in money or kind to church fairs or church dinners who would not gladly bear his fair proportion of a subscription to a worthy purpose if he could have the assurance that the whole system would be abandoned. Religion, certainly, cannot hope to gain the confidence of non-professors so long as it is made the cover for practices that are pernicious in themselves and even prohibited by law."

News of the Week.

The City.

Hon. J. B. Rice, M. C, from the 1st Illinois district, died in Norfork, Va., last week and his body brought home to Chicago for burial. He was one of the earliest theatrical managers of the city.——Sunday last Edmund Juessen, a prominent German, lectured under the auspicies of the Sunday afternoon Lecture Society on "the Sunday Laws" which he denounced as an outgrowth of Puritan intolerance, as in defiance of the constitution and should be abolished; the prosperity of the country is due to the foreign population, and their views should be received. The arrogance of such declamations is wonderful. The Pilgrims laid the strong foundation of the very house which shelters the foreigners, but their special mission is to defile and destroy it. The Tribune publishes the address in full and lauds it.——A society for the assistance of poor females, called The Good Samaritans, has passed a quarrelsome existence through the influence of women of spiritualistic views. They finally drove off the Christian ladies, and last week terminated a quarrel among themselves by the incarceration of some of the managers.

The Capitol.

—The new Civil Rights bill reported by the House Judiciary Committee, differs from the bill of the late Charles Sumner, in this respect—that in place of the mixed school section, provision is inserted requiring equal school facilities for the children of both races. The Committee think it the best bill which could secure the support of the present Congress.——A Centennial tea party was held in the Capitol last Wednesday night. It was attended by President Grant and Cabinet, King Kalakaua, the Judges of the Supreme Court, and other distinguished persons. Secretary Robeson delivered an address.——Kelley, of Pa., and Maynard, of Tennessee, have spoken in the House in favor of restoring the franking privilege.——The Pacific Mail subsidy investigation has come upon an unruly witness. Irvin who was chief lobbyist for the Mail Company after feigning sickness several days at length became sullen and refused to communicate. It is known that he spent $750,000 in getting the favor of Congress The question is, who got the money.——King Kalakaua was presented to Congress last Friday.——Mr. Cochran, of Chicago, it is said, will be appointed supervising architect of the Treasury Department, vice Mullet, resigned.——The Board of Indian Commissioners recommend the following for the Indian Territory: First, a Territorial government; second, the establishment of United States courts; third, a delegate in Congress.

The Country.

Two burglars were shot while plundering the unoccupied house of Judge Von Brunt in Bay Ridge near New York last week. One died immediately, the other lived long enough to confess that the two were the kidnappers of Charley Ross from Germantown, Pa., last summer, but the dead man only knew where he was. The authorities of New York and Philadelphia have not yet found the lost child. Mr. Ross, the father, has successfully sued a Reading (Pa.) paper for libeling the family about the abduction.——Commander William B. Cushing, well known for his daring exploits in the late war, including the destruction of the Confederate iron-clad steamer Albermarle, died in Washington last Thursday. Only a few days ago he was removed to the Government Insane Hospital, near Washington, for treatment.——Two men were killed by falling walls at a fire in Knoxville, Ill., last Friday.——The iron manufacturers of Pa., N. J., and Maryland held a convention lately and decided to reduce their production one-half next year. They also recommended inflation of currency.——The long strike of the dock men of New York has come to an end, and the men are now seeking employment where they can find it. The 9,000 or 10,000 men belonging to the Unions have lost nearly a million dollars wages.——Two or three fires in Boston on Tuesday of last week destroyed property worth over $600,000.——On the same day a cotton press and large amount of material were burned in Charleston, S. C——A murderer named Howard who had received the severest sentence under the Iowa laws—imprisonment for life—was taken from jail at Des Moines last week and hung. It is supposed he had murdered between 20 and 30 victims.

Foreign.

The Von Armin trial terminated last week in his conviction and sentence to imprisonment for three months. He was clearly proved guilty of grave official, if not criminal, misconduct, and his punishment is considered very light. The Emperor at Bismarck's request will probably pardon him. Probably no single act of Bismarck's career has called out more abuse from his enemies and the foreign press, but the wisdom of his course is fully vindicated. The police have warned Bismarck of a fresh plot against his life. There were rumors of Bismarck's resignation last week, on account of the action of the German assembly concerning the arrest of one of its members.—Despatches from Cuba state that Carlos Garcia, the noted bandit, and all his followers have laid down their arms and thrown themselves on the clemency of the Government. The coming sugar crop is reported to be unprecedently large, and is expected to be the largest ever in Cuba.

Home and Health Hints.

Frozen Persons—How to Treat Them.

The season has now arrived when many persons are liable to suffer from severe freezing. It is well, therefore, that all should know how to care properly for one who is near perishing from exposure to intense cold, or who has severely frozen some portion of his body.

The first effect of an exposure of the whole body to severe cold, is an almost irresistible impulse to sleep, which, if yielded to, is soon succeeded by coma or insensibility, and death. During this comatose state the body is pale and cold, the pulse and the respiration are almost imperceptible, and the pupils are dialated; but the limbs are flexible as long as life remains, unless the degree of cold be very great indeed. Persons who have been exhausted by hunger, watching or fatigue, and those who indulge in spirituous liquors, exhausted as they are by perpetual stimulation, are much more liable to suffer from cold than are others.

Whenever a person has been exposed to a great degree of cold, and seems likely to succumb to its influence, the indications for treatment are, first: To induce moderate reaction, and restore the circulation and the sensibility; 2d. to avoid reaction, which would surely lead to violent and dangerous inflammation.

To fulfill these indications, the body should first be rubbed with snow, and afterward, when the warmth and sensibility are somewhat restored, it should be wiped quite dry, and well rubbed with fur or flannel. The patient should now be put into a cold bed, in a room without a fire; a stimulating enema of common salt and water, with a few drops of oil of turpentine, may be administered, and, as soon as he can swallow, a little wine or spirit and water should be given.

The after treatment must be regulated by the state of the patient, but mild cordial and stimulants, with nourishing food, will be sufficient in most cases. Caution: Do not bring the patient into a warm room, or apply artificial heat in any way, until complete reaction his taken place, and all danger of excessive inflammation has passed by.

The term frost-bite is applied to cases in which only some portions of the body, as the feet, hands, ears, etc., are frozen. In such cases the parts affected should be rubbed with snow, for while the friction restores the circulation and sensibility, the snow prevents the reaction. After a short time cold water may be substituted for the snow, and the friction may be brisker. These applications should be made in a room without a fire, and a high or even a moderate temperature must be avoided for some time, if the patient would escape the subsequent inconvenience of chilblains and running sores.

If the freezing has been so severe that mortification and sloughing ensue, stimulating poultices, washes, ointments, etc., will be important. A poultice made of yeast, or of carrots, with a little pulverized charcoal, a wash of diluted carbolic acid, or of creosote or carbolic acid is an ingredient, will be useful.

Chilblains consist in a peculiar inflammation of the skin, induced by sudden alternations of temperature. Repeatedly warming the hand and feet by a fire when cold and damp, is the most common cause of these troublesome afflictions. A great variety of things have been recommended for chilblains, among the best of which are, soap liniment six parts, tincture of cantharides one part; a liniment composed of lime water two parts, linseed oil one part; a wash of muriatic acid one part, water seven parts; diluted creosute, or carbolic acid; and cold foot baths.—Country Gentleman.

What an "Oil Man" Says.—I wish to call the attention to all consumers of kerosene oil to the pernicious and unhealthy practice of using lamps filed with that article with the wick turned down. The gas which should be consumed by the flame is by this means left heavily in the air, and the cost of the oil thus saved at present prices would scarce be one dollar a year for the lamps of a household. My attention was particularly called to this custom by boarding in the country where kerosene was the only available light. A large family of children living in the same house were taken ill one night, and on going to the nursery the mother found the room nearly suffocating, with a lamp turned nearly out, whereupon the physician forbade the use of a lamp at night unless burned at full head.

Farm and Garden.

Horses for Farm Work.—A writer in the Mark Lane Express gives the following as the desisable points for consideration in the breeding of horses for farm work:

The head should be comely, but not so small as that of the running horse, as it enables the animal to throw more weight into the collar. He should be broad and flat in the forehead, have neat, well set on ears, prominent placed eyes, thin eye-lids, large nostrils, neat neck and be deep towards the chest; not very high in the withers, with upright shoulders, broad fore-arm, broad flat bone below the knee, rather short pasterns, good round feet not too flat or too upright, pleanty of hoof, clean leg, straight back, with plenty of loins, and ribs well arched. He should be long on the back rib and long in the quarter; the haunch should be strong, the hip well down, the hock joint broad; and for a breeder, no animal should be used that is not free from curb, bog or bone spavin, split or side bones. Horses with well developed muscles and good constitution are easily kept, and can endure great fatigue.

Plaster as a Manure.—A correspondent of the Maine Farmer writes: There seems to be little doubt but what plaster, or as it is called by chemists, sulphate of lime, is on some soils an efficient and cheap manure; while on other soils it seems to be of little or no value, as no difference can be detected in the crops following its use. Now, in order to tell the soil on which it will pay to use, is a question that we shall have to decide for ourselves, for I am not aware that any man can tell by looking at the soil, where it will pay to use it, or where it will not pay. Therefore, if we would know for a certainty, it is best to try small quantities on different parts of the field, either by sowing on grass lands as a top dressing, or by using a manure for field crops in different ways, and the answer that you may get will likely be a true one. After you have found where it will pay, then use it liberally, and it may be well to say here that if the crops are all consumed upon the farm, there need be no fears of running your farm by using plaster in a judicious manner.

Chicken Cholera.—Mr. H. Hales, of New Jersey, claims to have had perfect success with such birds as he treated (in time) in the following manner: He placed the ailing birds in boxes and clean straw, and cut away such feathers as has been soiled by their evacuations, and as a means of sustaining life fed them with oat-meal gruel, into which was put some finely-chopped rue. This, of course, had to be poured down the throats of the sick birds. In addition he sprinkled carbolic powder upon the straw in the boxes where the fowls were placed, dusted some into their feathers, and gave them a teaspoonful or two of water slightly impregnated with carbolic acid, which can be obtained of any druggist. The ailing fowls were kept apart from those in health, and, after the administration of this remedy, rapidly recovered. He treated two or three dozen in this way, and thinks he should have lost all of them had they not been so treated.

A "Young Farm Matron," who had about one hundred fowls, half of which died ere she discovered any remedy, says she fed bran-mash, in which was a liberal dose of the common garden pepper,—feeding every other day for two weeks,—and has had no more loss from chicken-cholera. She says, "Whenever I see a chicken appear droppy, I give it a dose of pepper, and all is well."

Another writer says: "To one gallon of sour milk add a tablespoonful of alum, and set it in shallow vessels where the chickens can drink as often as they choose. We have used it three years, and none of our chickens die of cholera when we attend to it in time."

How to Hang Hogs.—A correspondent of the Western Rural says:—Take the hind wheels, axle-tree and reach of a common wagon. Fasten a common farm ladder to the axle-tree, and the reach. Let the ladder extend five feet behind the axle-tree. Back the hind end of the ladder on to the bench where your dressed hog lies, roll him on the ladder, then let one man or lad take hold of the forward round of the ladder and play horse, and trundle it five or ten rods to where you wish to hang the hogs. Ground the forward end of the ladder, and your hog is in position for the gallows. Try it once, and you will never lubber-lift again.

Facts and Figures.

There are in England 20 dukes, 19 marquises, 110 earls, 23 viscounts, 24 bishops, 230 barons. All these, with four dukes (who are princes of the blood) and the two archbishops, are members of the House of Lords, as it is usually termed, but which is more correctly called the House of Peers.

A new form of marriage, of the nature of a civil contract, has recently been promulgated in Japan. This, by recognizing woman's right to be a party to a contract in marriage, is a decided advance toward her elevation, and hence toward the elevation of the race.

Prof. Whitney, of Yale College, has examined a passage of 1,000 sounds from each of ten standard English writers, in order to ascertain the relative frequency of sounds in the language. He finds that the sound of "r" is the most frequent, occurring 744 times in 10,000 sounds; "n" follows with 676, and "s" with 592. The short sound of "i" is the most common vowel sound, having 590 occurrences. The least common consonant sound is that of "zh," two times in 10,000. In all, he found 6,271 consonant sounds, and 3,729 vowel sounds.

It is stated that the total annual production of paper in the world amounts to 1,800,000,000 pounds. Of this, 200,000,000 pounds are consumed by the Government offices, 180,000,000 by schools, 240,000,000 in commerce, 180,000,000 in industrial manufactures, 100,000,000 in private correspondence, and 900,000,000 in printing. In addition to these established uses for paper, it is being consumed as a substitute for wood and metal in several departments of manufacture. Paper vessels for holding water have been generally introduced; while boats, billiard balls, car-wheels, and even houses, are constructed of the material.

The police boundaries of London cover 576 square miles and a population of 4,000,000 of inhabitants. Here are gathered more Jews than there are in Palestine, more Scotch than there are in Edinburgh, more Irish than there are in Dublin, more Roman Catholics than there are in Rome, and there is a great variety in the languages spoken. There is a birth in London every five minutes, and a death every eight minutes.

At one of the large manufacturing establishments in Middletown, Conn., recently, a handful of cotton waste, which had been used to clean machines, was left on a work bench, and in a little over an hour after it had been used was in flames. This excited the curiosity of those who saw it, and another piece was saturated with boiled linseed oil, and in less than two hours took fire from spontaneous combustion. Another piece was tried, and in half an hour was so hot that it could not be held.

Temperance.

The Chicago Woman's Temperance Union.

This organization is maturing plans for active future work. The branch societies in the three divisions have been revived. Mrs. D. A. Beale, of Janesville, Wis., secretary of the State Temperance Order, who came here by invitation of the "Union," and who has addressed audiences at Dr. Helmer's, Dr. Arthur Mitchell's, and Dr. E. E. Felton's (Grace) churches, on the subject of Bands of Hope in the Sabbath-schools, will return, after the holidays, to assist in forming them. She has made the subject one of special study, and has the best methods extant. The ladies are trying to devise ways of reaching and benefiting intemperate men. Much of this will doubtless be done through the "Reform Club," which is already in the field.

M. A. B.

TEMPERANCE FANATICS.—This is the title given to those who have recently crusaded against rum. The title is conferred chiefly by those who take "a little wine for their stomach's sake," or a good deal for their palate's sake. Already the anti-temperance men cry out, "The woman's temperance excitement is subsiding. I thought there would be nothing permanent." But the excitement of the day of Pentecost lasted only one day, yet who will say there were no permanent results?

For the next ten thousand years the good movement will be felt. Within a few months eight hundred rum-sellers have given up their business and professed faith in Christ; 2,500 grog-shops have been closed. Two hundred and fifty Western towns are entirely free from rum-selling establishments. Fifteen millions of dollars less of revenue from rum-sellers have been paid in at Washington than in the same length of time last year. When President Grant was told of this, he said, "Very well, put the tax on something else." So say we. We cannot afford to have the rum traffic go on, though the traffickers should pay ten dollars of revenue where now they pay one.—Good News.

THE NEW METHODIST RULE.—The amendment to the general rule of the Methodist church, South, on intemperance, is not getting on well. This amendment forbids the manufacture and sale, as well as the use, of intoxicating drinks. The ballots of the Conference have thus far resulted as follows:

Illinois Conference—yeas, 4; nays, 28. Western Illinois—yeas, 6; nays, 24. Denver—Yeas,—; nays, 15. West Virginia—Yeas, 18; nays, 26. Kentucky,—Yeas, 54; nays, 38. Missouri—Yeas, 27; nays, 79. Taxation that Kills.

We have before us the report of Mr. Ruffner, Superintendent of the Virginia Board of Public Instruction, for 1873, and we find in it, arrayed in startling figures a statement of taxation for liquors, drank within the State, which fully accounts for the poverty, not only of Virginia, but of all the Southern States; while it also gives the reason for the straitened circumstances of millions in the North. There are 2,856 retail liquor shops in the State. If these shops sell the average amount of liquor sold by the liquor shops of the United States, and there is no reason to suppose they do not, the annual amount consumed is $10,622,888. There are additions to be made to this from wholesale dealers and patent medicines which are brought and consumed for their alcohol, that raise the aggregate to $12,000,000. There is no doubt that the sum total exceeds these terrific figures, which leaves out entirely the alcohol used for mechanical and manufacturing purposes. This sum exceeds the total value of all the farm productions, increase in live stock, and value of improvements in the year 1870, according to the U. S. Census, in the seven best counties of the State, and by just about the same amount, the value of the productions of forty-five smaller counties during the same year. The wheat crop of Virginia for 1870, was, in round numbers, 8,000,000 bushels. This, at $1.50 per bushel, which is more than was received, makes exactly $12,000,000. In brief, Virginia drank up its entire wheat crop to the last gill!

Mr. Ruffner presents other illustrative estimates, but nothing can add to the force of those which we have cited. He then goes on to show that the total taxation for State purposes, including legislation, salaries, courts, institutions for dumb, blind and insane, public schools, and interest on the public debt only reaches the sum of $3,500,000, while to add to this sum all the local taxation, would not equal the burden which the people voluntarily lay upon themselves. But this is not all. The injury done to public order, and private health and enterprise, is to be taken into account. Mr. Ruffner believes that the time wasted, the injury done to business, and the cost of crime, pauperism, insanity, and litigation resulting from intemperance, would be more costly than the liquor itself. Then the Superintendent, with figures furnished by the distinguished English actuary, Nelson, in the interests of Life Insurance, shows how much valuable life is thrown away. Between fifteen and twenty years of age, the number of deaths of intemperate persons, is as 10 to 18; between twenty-one and thirty, 10 to 51; between thirty and forty, 10 to 40. At twenty years of age a temperate person's chance for life is 44.5 years—intemperate, 15.6; at thirty, the temperate man's chance is for 35.5 years, intemperate, 13.8; at forty years the proportionate chances are 18.8 to 11.5 years. Thus money, health, morality, industry, good order, and life itself, in enormous sums, go into this bottomless caldron. Is there any return of good for all this expenditure? None. The loss is entire and irremediable. If the whole had gone over Niagara Falls, something would be picked up on the shore below, but nothing is left from this waste. A bushel of grain transformed into alcohol, and swallowed as a beverage, is a bushel of grain annihilated. If all that is spent for liquor were put into a huge furnace and burned, we should have ashes; but as it is, we have no ashes except such as, with shame and tears, we are obliged to bury.—Scribner's Monthly.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issued by him, purporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationalist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—'The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The author belonged to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughout the country forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is supposed by many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acquainted with Mr. Greene, and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y., and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to those chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—'The Storm Gathering;" "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

History of The Abduction and Murder of Cap't. Wm. Morgan,

He was in our office and desired much to purchase a Masonic book to aid him in exposing the principles of Masonry, but was unable to do so as he was a theological student with only a small income for his support. There are a number of small books Revelations, of Masonry and Odd-fellowship, History of Morgan's Abduction, Valance's Confession, etc. Send in orders promptly, so that they may be filled before the first of January.

Big Invention.

Lloyd, the famous map man, who made all the maps for General Grant and the Union army, certificates of which he published, has just invented a way of getting a relief plate from steel so as to print Lloyd's Map of American Continent—showing from ocean to ocean—on one entire sheet of blank note paper, 40x50 inches large, on a lightning press, and colored, sized and varnished for the wall so as to stand washing, and mailing anywhere in the world for 25 cents, or unvarnished for 10 cents. This map shows the whole United States and Territories in a group from surveys to 1875, with a million places on it, such as towns, cities, villages, mountains, lakes, rivers, streams, gold mines, railway stations, &c. This map should be in every house. Send 25 cents to the Lloyd Map Company, and you will get a copy by return mail.

Topics of the Time.

Howard, dangling from a Des Moines lamp post, is another argument against the unjustly lax law of Iowa. The Arabs, it is said, have such regard for the law that has come down to them through forty or fifty centuries, that life must go for life, that they do not even strike a man but with the open palm, lest they take life. But when a latitudinarian policy takes possession of a State such monsters in murder as this Howard is reported to be are a natural result; and when just judgment is set aside, and an opportunity is given the murderer to escape the law and again prey on society, instinctive justice volunteers to execute that law, and palliates, not excuses, the ruthless vengeance of the mob. The violent state of society at the South, and on the frontier, is chiefly due to the inefficiency of the laws or of their execution. If capital punishment is to be abolished, abolish murder first.

Is the Philapelphia spiritualistic swindle anything but a common conjurer's trick, pieced out by pretended supernatural manifestations? Were the impositions of Homes, the rope-tying of the Davenport brothers, the spirit photographs and paper tricks any but a low sort of legerdemain, not to be mentioned with the magic of Hartz and Heller, which was honest enough to be wholly human? Is it important to fallen and tempted men that they recognize the existence and superior power of spiritual forces? Unquestionably it is of the first importance. If we fight neither seeing our enemy, knowing his nature, power, or cunning, in short, without regarding him as an enemy, we fight an ambuscade and without the least hope of success. Does not Satan recognize this fact? and what better means would he take to confuse the ideas of men than such "Katie King" swindles? Everywhere it is interpreted as another proof that spiritual influences are a sham, and there are no personalities, "principalities" and "powers of darkness" against which we "wrestle:" and so the hellish darts find entrance through the ungirt armor.

The communist faction has again opened its Sunday sessions in Chicago. Last winter its bold words against social order and stability drew from the Tribune the declaration that "it would be wise for us to co-operate heartily in the efforts now being made to check the flow of immigration hither, if we would be saved from the commune." The wisdom of such a course is becoming less questionable daily, since foreign influences threaten worse evils than the commune. A Sabbath or two since one of the editors of the Tribune introduced in the "Sunday Afternoon Lecture course" a direct and violent attack on our Sabbath system. The commune aims at property interests mainly; the Sabbath opposers would destroy even that upon which property rests. Before the Sabbath and temperance questions the commune fades out. The proposition of the Tribune will bear consideration, but it is based on the suicidal principle, that we may exclude poor foreigners whose oppressions have embittered their social life, but welcome the rich and more unprincipled, and accept also their social and religious customs without question. This is national self-destruction.

The leading editorial in last week's issue of H. W. Beecher's paper, evidently written by himself, is a reply to the suspicions of the weakness of his case before the law from the management of his counsel. In this article Mr. Beecher says "We feel it to be the duty and the privelege of a Christian man to bear a thousand attacks upon his own reputation in silence, rather than suffer one innocent woman to be vilified for his sake before the world." This declaration may be put forward to explain Mr. Beecher's continued silence and puzzling letters, but will hardly account for the Adamic apology made to his committee of investigators that Mrs Tilton's overweening fondness led him into acts that might be misconstrued. However, Mr. Beecher now promises that "there will be no compromise" and no acquittal will be asked or accepted on "any narrow, or technical, or apologetic ground." If the parties in the case will keep to this text there is hope for relief. The public has already given its verdict on the testimony presented, and probably nine out of every ten men have said "guilty." Mr. Beecher has made two forced appeals to the jury of the people whose opinion he loftily presumes to ignore; first his own statement, then that of his committee of friends. Both were to his hopes like lead to a swimmer; and the inexorable judgment of men led him to appeal to the grand jury. It remains that some new evidence be soon brought before the courts, if Mr. Beecher's innocence is to be established.

The Year's Last Moment.

The crowd sweeps onward still:
  And we with it move on,
Part of the ever-rushing multitude,
  Till the great goal be won,
And for the last time sinks the ever-setting sun.

Another hour has struck,
  With solemn note, and slow;
Another fragment of Time's cliff has rushed
  Into the vale below;
Another of earth's streams this moment ceased to flow.

Another lamp of Time
  Has flickered into gloom,
And left us lonelier in our lonely watch,
  Waiting the light to come;
Not into, but beyond, the life-devouring tomb.

Another of Time's stars
  Has vanished from the eye;
Ah! now the light of the immortal dawn
  Is coming up the sky,
And quenching, one by one, these midnight gems on high.

Another headland turned,
  While bends the quivering mast;
Another beacon of the lone, lone sea
  Our vessel has shot past.
The shore, the shore is near! Is that the heaven at last?

Another bridge of life
  Has now been crossed: few more
Remain for us; another bridge of time
  We've reached, from it t' explore
The far-outspreading green of the not distant shore.

Another pillar fallen
  In Time's old temple! See
How fragment upon fragment darkly lies;
  And hear how heavily
The echoes wind along by the slow-swelling sea!

Another song has closed,
  A true but varied strain,
And the deep-turret chime I hear afar
  Has echoed out, Amen,
Swelling the long-drawn fall of the well-known refrain.

Oh, well for us to watch!
  Our night will soon be o'er;
The day of mortal doom approaches fast,
  The Judge is at the door;
Awake! arise, my soul, and sleep thy sleep no more!

John Todd's Testimony.

[In reply to a committee of students in Amherst College Dr. Todd wrote the following letter. This veteran author and pastor so widely known and loved died about a year ago in Pittsfield.]

PITTSFIELD, Mass., Aug. 1, 1849.

GENTLEMEN:—Unhesitatingly I give my decided disapprobation of what I deem "Secret Societies" in college or elsewhere. I have never known any good results from them which could not have been attained in some other more appropriate way, and I have known great evils resulting from them. A good man ought to have nothing in outward conduct or acts to conceal. It is the nature of sin to seek concealment and darkness, and everything seeking concealment looks suspicious. It is sometimes pleaded that these secret societies are charitable institutions and help their members in distress. It may be so. But that seems to me to be a very narrow kind of charity whose bank discounts only to stock holders. Most earnestly would I advise young men to let them alone, especially in college. I think the testimony of the last half century in our colleges would be that no pious young man may hope to join such a society without bringing suspicion over his piety and really depressing it, if not destroying it; and that they have not unfrequently been the slaughtering houses of moral character and hopes. The testimony of experience is uniform on this subject.

Open action, open character, open life,—transparent, pure and cheerful—are great parts of all great and good men, and if you will observe in real life, you will see that first rate men seek to cultivate and possess these traits.

In great haste, which is a poor apology for doing anything poorly.

Yours respectfully, J. TODD.

A Declaration from the Des Moines Presbytery, U. P. Church.

DEAR BRETHREN:—There have been in every age of the world and the church peculiar and popular forms of sin, more or less general, by which the great deceiver has sought to undermine the church of God, and lead the unsuspecting gradually away from the pure and spiritual worship, and from an entire and thorough obedience in Jesus Christ.

These efforts of the "powers of darkness," we are led to believe, will increase on until the time of the end; deceiving, if it were possible, the chosen and faithful children of God. Their danger is mainly found in the cunning admixture of truth and error, and in the ostensible object of conferring moral, political, social and temporal good. Not unfrequently important and much needed reforms in social and political life, are made the vehicles for the discrimination of sentiments utterly at war with God's revealed will, and calculated to undermine confidence in God's methods for the promotion of human well being.

The enemy readily perceives that if the Christian world can be convinced that God's methods are imperfect, and that some departments of human activity and human interests lie beyond the jurisdiction of Christian law, a position is gained upon which to plant batteries for the demolition of the whole Christian fabric. He understands that Christianity, to be a perfect system, must be everything to men if it is anything, and that to embrace and sanc-tify any human interest thoroughly it must take in every interest, and that, moreover, its impregnability is found in a faith and obedience upon the part of its subjects that are universal. In the age in which we live, amongst other movements exemplifying the cunning devices of the reigning spirit of sin, in that of secretism by which men are bound together in "mystic ties," the strands of which are made up of solemn oaths and promises, the hope of some selfish gain and the fascinations of successful secrecy in the exercise of unseen and irresponsible power. This movement is gaining in scope and influence constantly. The number of "secret societies" is increasing. Almost every popular movement is assuming this form. They exist everywhere in our colleges and universities, villages, towns and cities, and the mania has swept recently over the entire country. With a view to your spiritual interests, and an earnest desire in behalf of your Christian integrity, we do hereby warn you against this rage of secretism as in itself unwise and foolish, contrary to the dignity of the Christian character, utterly at variance with the genius of the religion you profess, and deleterious to the true interests of society.

The oath that is taken in many of these associations is sinful, because the circumstances under which it is taken, and the nature of the interests involved, by no means demand or justify so solemn an appeal to God—we might say such solemn trifling with a divine institution—and because it is a direct violation of the divine law in reference to the character of the oath In the book of Jeremiah, fourth chapter and second verse, we have law as follows: "Thou shalt swear, the Lord liveth, in truth, in judgment and in righteousness." No man can swear "in truth, in judgment and in righteousness" who swears "never to reveal" things of which he is ignorant at the time, or to be in obedience to "signs" or orders from brothers of the craft or superiors to be issued under circumstances and in reference to matters that he yet knows nothing about. In the order of the "Patrons of Husbandry" the oath, in view of the voluntary and artificial nature of the organization and the nature of the interests involved, is utterly unjustifiable.

In the other and older order, after which this is modeled, the oath is of so serious a nature that no man with an intelligent Christian conscience can take it without shuddering and without regretting it ever afterwards. Moreover, these societies all have a religion, a religious faith, religious services, ritual, officers and emblems, through propose to confer spiritual blessings and prepare the members, as their burial services and the charge to the chaplain intimate, for a place in the "Grand Lodge" or "Great Grange above." This religion, to say the least of it, is fragmentary, superficial and unavailing, knowing nothing of the doctrines of human sinfulness and guilt, and of a divine Saviour from the condemnation of sin. Possessing no spiritual power, and calculated only to lure the unthinking which if they mean anything, and, if they mean nothing, the whole thing is solemn trifling and blasphemy. They into resting in and being satisfied with a mere "form of godliness." Christians who indulge in the services of such a religion forsake, for the time being at least, the "fountain of living waters," and betake themselves to "broken cisterns that hold no water." Then again, with all the good that may be claimed for them, there is in these associations an utter want of all Christian motives and Christian consecration. The sentiment "for Christ's sake" is not found there. "Whatsoever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." "Whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." This is Christian law. No man we are persuaded ever, in the exercise of any degree of Christian intelligence, entered a "secret oath-bound society" in the name of the Lord Jesus," or "for the glory of God."

We can conceive that Christians, for want of due consideration, or under false notions of liberty in reference to the obtaining of temporal good, or with very imperfect views of Christian consecration, have been lured into these associations, but that any have been induced to take this step through prayerful examination of God's Word, and motives to obey and honor their Savour is utterly impossible. Satan is a most cunning deceiver, and takes advantage of our comparative ignorance and want of thought. He aims to keep Christ's professed followers, as much as possible, in ignorance of the universal empire of the law of Christ over the entire life, and of the obligations of grace over saved souls to consecrate all to him, and to bring every interest within the sanctifying and conserving influences and laws of this kingdom.

If he cannot entirely destroy the Christian's faith, he will do all he can to lead him astray in conformity to the world, entangle him in worldly alliances, retard his spiritual growth, rob him of his assurance, darken his hope, destroy his Christian experiences that are found only in living near to and walking with God, and, if possible, use his influence in building up and establishing customs and institutions at varience with the interests of the Redeemer's kingdom, and through which to operate more successfully in his work of crime and death. The whole system of secretism is a device of Satan, antagonistic to the genius of the Christian religion, and, with all the good that is incorporated with it, subversive of the spirit of true and loyal devotion to Jesus and ensnaring to the soul. We, therfeore, kindly and earnestly beseech you to "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness." "See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, redeeming the time, because the days are evil."

Which Horn of the Dilemma.

BY H. H. HINMAN.

Freemasonry may be rightfully judged by its standard authorities, and thus judged we find it to be a system of enormous pretentions.

It professes to teach science. "Masonry" (says Sickle's Monitor, p. 62) "includes within its circle almost every branch of polite learning. Under the veil of its mysteries is comprehended a regular system of science. In the investigation of its latent doctrines the philosopher and the mathematician find equal satisfaction and delight." In speaking of the third degree, on page 95, he says, "We now find a man complete in morality and intelligence with the stay of religion added to secure firm the protection of Deity and to guard him against ever going astray. These three degrees form a perfect and harmonious whole, nor can we conceive that anything more can be suggested that the soul of man requires."

Dr. Mackey, in his Masonic Lexicon, p. 297, says that the Master Mason has entered the holy of holies, that he "represents a man saved from the grave of iniquity and raised to the faith of salvation;" and that the Master's degree "inspires the most cherishing hope of the final reward that belongs alone to the just made perfect."

Now these enormous pretensions are the glittering bait that Masonry holds out to the world, and they are either true or false. If they are true, then no man has a right to conceal the mysteries of Masonry for an hour; for what shall be thought of a man who is in possession of knowledge by which he has been raised from "the grave of iniquity to the faith of salvation," has been "inspired with a most cheering hope of the final reward that belongs alone to the just made perfect" and yet will not impart it to his wife and children, and has even sworn he would not do it. Has such a man the slightest claim to be called a Christian, or even a decent neighbor or citizen?

But suppose these pretensions are not true, (as manifestly they are not) then the whole system is one of quackery and falsehood. Its authors are liars and all the members of the fraternity aiders and abetters of a system of lying and fraud. That they are not conscious of their complicity in this iniquity does not alter the fact.

Now which horn of the dilemma will Masons accept? What Masonry says of itself is either true or false, and in either case there is no escape from positive guilt.

Among the forms of insect life, there is a little creature known to naturalists which can gather around itself a sufficiency of atmospheric air, and so clothed upon, it descends into the bottom of the pool, and you may see the little diver moving about dry, at its ease, protected by its crystal vesture, and though the water all around and above be stagnant and bitter. Prayer is such a protector; a transparent vesture—the world sees it not: a real defence—it keeps us out of the world. By means of it the believer can gather so much of heavenly atmosphere around him, and with it descend into the putrid depths of this contaminating world, that for a season no evil will touch him; and he knows when to ascend for a new supply.—Hamilton.

Our Foreign Population.

Jacob Post, who had been engaged in evangelistic labor among our foreign population for twenty years past contributes some facts in regard to this large class of our people to the Interior. His statements apply more particularly and fully to our large cities. He says: "Every reader of the public press will know that at present, not only in New York, but in nearly all the large cities of this Union, strong associations are formed for the purpose of making compulsatory instruction in the German languages in our public schools. The design of the leaders of these associations is to mold the habits and morals of this country after their own fathers, and to counteract, as much as possible, the progress of Americanizing and Christianizing our foreign-born youth.

. . . There are thousands in this country who came to this side of the water because they were not permitted to spout in their own country their peculiar theories. Most of them able-bodied men, they were not permitted in their own fatherland to live on the capital of others. Too lazy to work, and having spent their last in sin and folly, partly educated in some infidel school, they come here and set themselves up as leaders of the poor and honest workman. With all the power of language all capitalists are denounced as robbers, while they instil in the hearts of every poor but simple laborer a hatred toward all that has any American look and appearance. Church-going people, but especially the ministers of the Gospel, are denounced in the work-shop, in the beer-saloon, or in the public hall, as hypocrites or fanatics, while God's holy Sabbath must be desecrated by open frolics. While in the old fatherland they were considered as dangerous agitators, liable every moment to be put into prison, they here express their communistic ideas and theories without fear or trembling.

Poisioning the heart and the head of many a poor and simple-minded man or woman, they make a living by gambling or some nefarious traffic. Soon learning the language of their adopted country, (though denouncing it among their countrymen,) many of these vagabonds (who were a curse in their own native land) get their names into the papers and at last, and too often, become a power in the land. Since the revolutions of 1848 and '49 in Europe, America has been a refuge of this dangerous class of immigrants, and we need not say that their influence has been great upon all who landed their poverty, their simplicity or their ignorance upon the genial shores of this republic.

The question has been asked, how shall we counteract the wicked influence of this of class men upon the mass of our foreign population? Shall it be done by Americanizing and Christianizing? Our experience has taught us that the influence of establishing Sabbath-schools, Bible-classes and preaching to the youth in the English language has had the most powerful result to counteract the wickedness of the wicked.

A Knightly Rescue.

In the Pythian Record, organ of the Knights of Pythias, we find the following remarkable story, which was evidently written to show what this order has done and is designed to do for traitors. As will be seen the hero of the story was in fact a rebel spy, and it was while acting in that capacity under the command of the rebel guerrilla chief Moseby, at Washington, that he was solicited and did join the Knights of Pythias. It is not only evident that the oaths and teachings of this order are such that a federal soldier, in order to obey them, could with impunity break his oath of allegiance to his country, but the author lauds him for his traitorous act and holds up his conduct for the admiration of the order, and as if sure of their approval he turns with an air of triumph to rebuke the opponents of secret societies for their unjust opinions.

Towards the close of the late civil war, while Richmond was closely besieged by the federals under General Grant, and Sherman was slowly, but surely drawing the fold of his great army around the few remaining confederate troops, still struggling under Johnson to make a headway in N. Carolina, four men clad in the gray cloth, which distinguished the soldiers of the lost cause from their opponents, might have been seen slowly making their way, on the shady side of a hedge row toward the little village of Benton, in North Carolina. They were a squad of confederate scouts, under a lieutenant named Courage, and had been out in Sherman's rear, on a reconnoisance. They had traveled far, and ridden fast, for they had learned news of the greatest importance to the confederate army concerning the movement of Sherman. To communicate this information, and thus put the confederates upon their guard, these men were hastening. Little imagined they the rapidity with which the federal general was marshalling his hosts, and little did they dream, that the sun which would set on the morrow upon the field over which they were then riding, would run with streams of human blood, and be strewn with human corpses. But so it was to be. An immense sea of human passions, was to be turned loose upon that fated field, to drown and destroy every green and animated thing thereon.

It happened that during the battle Lieut. Courage, the leader of the party spoken of, was fighting at the head of his company, as gallant a set of men as were ever led into battle or charged an enemy, when he received what was supposed to be a serious wound in the shoulder, from a minnie ball, which threw him with some violence from his horse to the ground, where he lay gasping, bleeding, and so confused in mind, as not to know what had happened. Later in the day he had so far recovered the possession of his faculties, as to recollect what had happened, and to be aware of a burning sensation of pain in the wounded portion of his body. But he had not more than time to realize his situation, and propose to himself some means of bettering it, when one of the federal ambulance corps came along, and took him with some of the federal wounded back to a field hospital, where his wound was examined and dressed. Afterwards as the surgeon in charge, did not think his wound of such a very serious nature, he was put in the charge of an orderly and sent to the guard house, where he was recognized by the sentinal on duty, as one who had previously been under his care, charged with being a spy. This recognition was reported to headquarters and the matter considered of so grave a character by the authorities, that other charges of a similar nature were at once preferred against him, a drumhead court martial was ordered to preside in his matter, and as the guard was willing to swear to his identity, his case was a hopeless one. When he learned what was going on he revolved the matter in his mind, and although he really was not the party whom the guard said he was, he saw no way out of the fatal difficulty, unless he could escape. The identity of poor Courage with the spy being established beyond cavil by the evidence of the guard, he was, in spite of the most earnest protestations to the contrary, and his frequently reiterated request for delay, until he could show he was not the man, convicted and sentenced to be shot with the rising of the next day's sun.

What were the unutterable feelings or exquisite agony of mind of poor Courage on this occasion, we have neither time nor inclination to describe. Where should he turn? He could hear the bitter jibe, the jeering taunt, the contemptuous laugh, from all. Stop! There was one face in the crowd that had a mild, benevolent expression—one eye that beamed kindly, pityingly upon him, which inspired hope to his fainting heart.

The winter previously, Courage, who had served as scout in Mosby's command, had occasion to go to Washington city, under instructions from his chief, to glean what he could of the enemy's next summer's campaign. While there he had made the acquaintance of several K. of P., and upon their solicitation had joined the order. The recollection of this circumstance rushed into his memory, and he at once determined to see if there were any Knights near him, and if there were then to ask their assistance. That night while a crowd, among whom was this kindly disposed stranger, was around the guard fire where Courage was kept strictly watched, he, unperceived gave the Knight signal of distress. It was heard and noted by more than one person in the crowd, and as soon as opportunity offered, the soldier he had marked, cautiously approached him. A whispered consultation was held between them unnoticed, and the result of it was, the stranger promised him help. And faithfully he kept his promise, for that night while the camp was hushed to repose, and naught could be heard, save the usual noises attendant upon all sleeping armies, the escape of Courage was effected. The means used, or what was the name of his generous preserver, it is needless to mention. It is enough to say that the dawning of another day, which was to have seen him a mangled corpse, killed as a spy, beheld him free as the birds of the air, and joyously travelling his way to a safer section, there to remain until better days. Then let those who say there is no good in secret societies, ponder well this o'er-true tale, and reflect upon what would have been the cruel and bloody fate of Lieut. Courage, but for the friendship engendered by the mystic tie. This proof was given by war, but peace daily offers as an evidence of the good there is in us thousands of instances where the sufferings of a brother, have been alleviated—the unfortunate have been succorded—the sick tended, the dying pillow patiently soothed, the last sad rites performed for the dead, and their necessitous widows and orphans consoled, protected and supported.

A Reason for the Religious Amendment.

It is for the moral, intellectual, spiritual, and material welfare of the people that we should acknowledge ourselves, and be recognized by the world as a Christian Nation.

When society is formed by men coming together, a government becomes necessary; and each individual gives up some of his natural rights, for the benefit of the whole. But, however carefully adjusted, it will bear more heavily upon some members of the community than upon others. The primary object sought should be the greatest good to the greatest number. In our government "of the people, by the people and for the people," this is the supreme object. It is a fact that the free-thinker who owns property is taxed more heavily in common with his Christian neighbor, because churches are exempt from taxation, and of course he looks upon this as a grievance. It is a fact that the Jew is compelled to send his children to the Free School where the Bible is read, or lose its advantages. It is a fact the German is abridged of some of his natural rights under this government where the observance of Sunday is enforced by law. Failing to see the great benefits which accrue to them respectively in the intelligence, commercial and other prosperity of the community at large, and the added security to their own lives and property, each of these classes complains against the system that confers these benefits upon it, for the peculiar grievance it believes itself subjected to. But whether these grievances are real or only apparent, these pessimists are but a small fraction of our whole people. We cannot afford, we dare not at their demand do aught as a government to subvert the very principle on which, and for which, the government itself was established—the greatest good to the greatest number. Loose reasoning in the church makes the fashionable Christian of the present day, who thinks the God he worships is all love, and that his justice never wakes. Under his system of devotion made easy, he sees no necessity for recognizing God in the Constitution, or in fact in any manner except in a luxuriously cushioned and fashionable church; and over the short distance which separates them he clasps hands with the rationalists, and together they march forward in opposition to this amendment under the banner of "Liberalism." If successful in this opposition, where will they stop? Ah! the skeptics will swell the ranks, and pull down and overturn, until the fair temple of religion is in the dust; and on its ruins they have set up again the statue of the goddess of reason.

This insidious and dangerous outgrowth of European civilization should be met and conquered by the united efforts of this Christian people; and our energies cannot be better directed then in urging to success the proposed amendment. When the fundamental law is thus amended, let it be so thoroughly taught, that the minds of our youth shall receive it without question, and with a faith as assured as they feel in the existence of the government itself. When they feel that as a nation we acknowledge our faith in God, and our belief in Christ, and that we base our laws on the code of morals taught in the Bible, they will grow up predisposed to yield obedience and to sustain the laws required to preserve the institutions of a Christian people against the attacks of the dangerous foreign element that is infusing its poison into our political system. We want more churches to give a spiritual direction to our money-getting race. We must have the Bible which alone teaches and preserves a true morality. By the side of the church springs up the school-house, diffusing secular education among the masses. The proposed religious amendment to the Constitution is an important step toward the desired objects, and with them gained, comes increased material prosperity, for where the churches most thickly crown the hills and dot the valleys of the land, there you will ever find the most prosperous community. Let us work for these things and not falter, and we shall go onward and upward along the pathway of progress until we achieve the highest destiny possible to a free, enlightened, and Christian nation.—Letter to Dr. Todd in Christian Statesman.

The great man is he who chooses the right with invincible resolution; who resists the sorest temptations from without and within; who bears the heaviest burdens cheerfully; who is calmest in storms and most fearless under menaces and frowns; and whose reliance on truth, on virtue, on God, is most unfaltering.

Reform News.

—Only partial reports of the New York State meeting at Lockport last week have been received. The meeting was an encouraging one; Bro. Stoddard, who attended, writes "all things taken into account" it was "surprisingly successful."

—The General Agent meets the Executive Committee of the N. Y. Association this week at Syracuse to plan for the work in that State. To-day (Thursday) he expects to be in Rochester where he will consult with Pres. Roberts of the National Association for the next Anniversary. The 9th of June next seems to suit all the friends he has consulted as the best time for that meeting.

—Friends who have written to the General Agent from Iowa and Michigan must be patient a few days. His mail was forwarded, but did not reach him. Be sure immediate attention will be given to all within a few days.

—Plans for a rousing State meeting in Ohio are under way. The Buckeye State will not be in the rear.

—Pennsylvania has a State agent. See report of the State Executive Committee. We learn that Bro. Raynor has youth, vigor, zeal, and above all an earnest piety as qualifications for his great work. God bless him in it.

—Bro. Philip Bacon, of Weatogue, Ct., displays the zeal of a model worker. See his letter which other reports confirm.

—Geo. Richey, of Pataskala, Licking Co., O., delivered twenty-two lectures against secrecy during the past fall, and will give more during the winter. He has challenged the lodges at Sparta and Pataskala to discuss with him the question: "Resolved, That no man can be at the same time an intelligent Freemason and a Christian." He is willing to discuss with any lodge champion in the State.

The New York State Association.

The following report of the convention at Lockport, Dec. 22 to 24th, is condensed from the Lockport Daily Journal.

The annual convention of the New York State Association, opposed to secret societies, commenced its session at Good Templar's Hall, in Lockport, Tuesday evening. Delegates were present from various parts of the State. The audience present in the hall last evening was small, but the delegates appeared to be earnest in the work in which they are engaged.

The convention was called to order by J. L. Barlow, President of the Association. In the absence of the Secretary, Rev. E. Barnett was chosen Secretary, pro tem. The meeting then engaged in devotional exercises.

Mr. George W. Clark, of Rochester, was called upon for a song. He promptly responded, and remarked before commencing his song, that he did not expect to see so many delegates present. He said they had come together to advocate and discuss a great fundamental truth. He then proceeded to sing, very acceptably, a song peculiarly appropriate to the occasion, at the close of which he was rapturously applauded.

President Barlow then proceeded to deliver his address to the Association. He said: In the good Providence of God we are again met in our annual convocation to grasp hands, look into each others faces, touch hearts in prayer and earnest, friendly council—take a review of the past, of labors performed, burdens borne and progress made, and from past experiences to be prepared the more wisely to enter upon the future. Something more than a year has past since we last met to take counsel, and parted in Christian love to rush to the front amid the roar, the din, the strife of battle. Not all who then and thus went forth, are come again. Some have fallen but with their faces to the foe. Among these was that princely soul, Adam Crooks, the loved and trusted chairman of the Executive Committee. The speaker paid an eloquent and touching tribute to the memory of the deceased, and then proceeded to speak of the year's work, the lecturers, the new State organizations in Missouri, Ohio and Pennsylvania, and detailed his own labors under appointment from the State Association.

The speaker then went on to tell that by reliance upon divine direction and aid, and by sending forth lecturers to agitate the question before the people, and furnishing the necessary means for their support, would be a great step forward in the work. He also rebuked officers who were yearly elected at conventions, for a lack of zeal and energy in the work, and suggested that county organizations be formed in all parts of the State; also, that Anti-masonic papers be patronized by Anti-masonic families. He also suggested that ministers who are Anti-masons, should bring the subject before their churches, and endeavor to enlist them in the cause until Masonry is put down. He urged all who recognized Masonry as inimical to God and man, to fight it aggressively, and go forward in the good work until victory is assured.

At the close of the address, Mr. Clark favored the Convention with another song, which was loudly applauded.

Rev. Mr. Wilder, of Pittsfield, N. Y., was then called upon, and delivered a short, extemporaneous address. He spoke of the barbarism, the indecency, and the folly of Masonry.

Rev. J. P. Stoddard next followed with an address, after which the President announced that a cordial invitation was extended to the citizens of Lockport, and especially members of Masonic lodges to attend the proceedings of the Convention. The benediction was pronounced and the meeting adjourned till the next day.

WEDNESDAY.

The Convention assembled at 10 o'clock A. M. and was called to order by the President. After prayer by Rev. A. K. Bacon and an appropriate song by Mr. Clark, it was resolved to recognize all visiting brethren and sisters in sympathy with the work, as members of the Association.

The following committees were appointed:

On Address and Resolutions—J. P. Stoddard, E. P. Marvin, N. Wardner, G. W. Clark.

On Nominations—Sidney Wilder, M. Merrick, L. W. Kralk, W. P. Betts, N. Brown.

On Finance—D. B. Douglas, D. Kirkpatrick, P. D. Miller, A. F. Dempsey, T. Corliss, Norris Gay, J. P. Stoddard.

On Enrollment—W. P. Betts, C. White, N. Green.

On Obituary—N. Wardner, A. F. Dempsey, A. K. Bacon, W. Pepper, N. R. Luce, J. L. Barlow, Edwin Barneston.

On Correspondence—D. B. Douglas, G. W. Clark, J. L. Barlow.

The subject of reports from the field in regard to the progress of the work was then taken up.

N. Wardner, of Dutchess Co., reported great success in his locality and stated that lectures he had delivered in his church at first enraged the lodge, but that in the same church in the revival since held, the leading members of the lodge, embracing the Master, were at the altar seeking personal salvation. Since that time they have had little or no heart for lodge affinities or Masonic labor.

G. W. Clark, the singer, related an incident that came within his own observation, in regard to a young man who had been encouraged by a D. D., in Christian labor, to persevere and go into the ministry, but the same D. D., gave an address on Freemasonry, which was soon followed by a lecture from himself, exposing the evils of the lodge, when the said young man confirmed his statements. Soon after an article appearing in a paper, evidently from the pen of the same D. D., which cast serious reflections upon the character of the young man, showing that character is not safe without the good will of the despotism of the lodge.

Edwin Barnetson and W. J. Betts gave encouraging reports from Tompkins county. The Groton town association organized recently with 58 members.

A. F. Dempsey, of Seneca Falls, reported progress in his locality.

D. B. Douglass spoke of the work in Niagara county, which, he assures the Convention, was progressive and encouraging. He said that the Masons were beginning to treat our cause with respect. Editors refused to publish notices of meetings in the beginning of the work, but now some of them were anxious to report our proceedings. He concluded by saying that they were determined to push forward this work until padlocks were removed from the people, press and pulpit.

J. P. Stoddard stated that politicians were deeply interested in the work. They are moving particularly in some parts of the West, and with success.

In the afternoon the subject brought up for discussion was "The Relation of Freemasonry to the Church." After prayer by Rev. N. R. Luce, N. Wardner, E. Barnetson, A. F. Dempsey and Sidney Wilder spoke on the question.

The Committee on Finances reported in part. Whereupon the National Agent (J. P. Stoddard) spoke on the subject of the report, in which he pressed upon the Convention the importance of guaranteeing a salary to the State agent and lecturer.

J. L. Barlow, the State agent, Sidney Wilder and G. W. Clark spoke on the same subject.

That part of the report which referred to the State agent was amended so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That we appoint Rev. J. L. Barlow, State agent and lecturer for the coming year, and guarantee him one thousand dollars for the year's service.

The amended report was then adopted.

Another song by Prof. G. W. Clark, entitled "Where there's a Will there's a Way."

After some further remarks by W. Post, and the benediction by J. L. Barlow, the Convention adjourned until 7 o'clock P. M.

In the evening, after prayer by the Rev. James Donaldson, of Canada, the committee on nominations reported in part, which report was adopted.

Song by Prof. Clark, entitled "A man's a man for a'that."

Rev. J. P. Stoddard, then came forward and delivered the lecture of the evening. His subject was "The government of the Lodge." He opened by saying that his information was obtained from Masonic publishing houses, and then proceeded to show that the diversity of character embraced by the lodge, requires a despotic government, quoting from Masonic authorities in support of his position. The first duty of the reader of synopsis was to obey the edicts of his Grand Lodge right or wrong. His very existence as a Mason hangs upon obedience to the powers immediately set above him. Failure in this brings down upon his head exulsion and kills him as a Mason. Rob Morris, one of the recognized authorities of Masonic jurisprudence sets forth that the one unpardonable crime in a Mason is contumacy or disobedience.

The supreme authority of Freemasonry is vested in a Supreme Council of Grand Inspectors General, two of which councils exist in the United States. The lecturer proceeded at great length and in earnest and eloquent language to discuss the despotism of Masonry, and its dangerous tendencies. He was listened to with profound attention and at the close of the address the audience broke forth into rapturous applause.

Among the audience was quite a large number of members of the Masonic fraternity from various lodges of the city.

Prof. Clark favored the convention with another song entitled "The Heart." After which a collection was taken up among the audience.

Rev. Mr. Post then pronounced the benediction and the meeting adjourned until Thursday morning.

Reports of the last day's sessions have not reached us; but we have learned that Mr. Kirkpatrick, of Syracuse, was elected President, and Pres. Roberts, of the National Association, took part on the third day. All returned home at the close encouraged at the prospect of the work before them. A completion of the report may be expected next week.

From Pennsylvania.—Important Business under Way.

WAVERLY, Luzerne Co., Pa.,
Dec. 19, 1874.

The Executive Committee of the Pennsylvania Association opposed to Secret Societies convened at 2o'clock P. M. Brother Davis Seamans was chosen chairman and Bro. C. E. Callender secretary of the meeting. The meeting was then opened by prayer by Elder Nathan Callender.

On motion it was decided to appoint a man as State Lecturer and Agent, and Rev. James W. Raynor, of Uniondale, Pa., was unanimously appointed to that work for one year.

Eld. Nathan Callender then moved that the State Association be responsible to our State Agent for $500 of his salary, which after considerable discussion was unanimously carried.

Bro. Callender then offered the following:

"Resolved, That the Executive Committee of the Pennsylvania State Association set Eld. J. W. Raynor to work continuously as soon as practicable, and that we pay him outside the regular lecture fund (of $500), for the work he may do before he enters permanently upon his duties as Agent and Lecturer, in the same proportion for the time he devotes to said work."

Adopted without discussion.

On presentation of a bill of charges by Rev. James W. Raynor for printing minutes of the Convention at Wilkesbarre, including express charges to sum of $4.50, it was moved that an order be drawn on our treasurer for the above amount. Carried.

The following names were suggested to solicit funds in their several localities to raise the balance of the lecture fund: S. A. Reynolds, Waverly; George Cobb, Factoryville; Nathan Callender, Green Grove; Joseph Powers, Harford; Newell Callender, Dalton and Mount Bethel; James Seamans, Benton; Charles Parker, Clarks Green; Simon Besecker, North Abington; Allen White, Bradford Co.

NOTICE THE FOLLOWING:—It was further Resolved, That the State Association hold a quarterly meeting at Factoryville, Wyoming Co., Pa., (on the Del. L. & W. R. R) on the 20th and 21st days of January, 1855, commencing at 1 o'clock P. M., of the 20th; and that Rev. J. P. Stoddard, of Chicago, be appointed to speak on the occasion. The time subject to change by the Committee to suit the circumstances of Bro. Stoddard. On motion adjourned sine die.

By order of Committee.

NATHAN CALLENDER, Cor. Sec.

From Connecticut.

WEATOGUE, Conn., Dec 21, 1874.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

I see by the Cynosure of Dec. 17th, which I received to-day, that you published my letter and the article cut from the Hartford Post. Bro. Levington wrote a reply and sent it to the editor by mail, but after waiting a week and it did not appear in that paper, I called on the editor and obtained the manuscript.

Now it may be interesting to the many readers of the Cynosure to know that the Post is, in part, owned and controlled by Ex-Gov. Marshall Jewell of this State, who was minister from our Government to Russia, and was recalled to fill the appointment of Postmaster General at Washington and this favored friend of President Grant is a Royal Arch Mason. As you published the article from the Post I send you Mr. Levington's reply:

THOSE ANTI-MASONIC LECTURES AT SIMSBURY.

MR. EDITOR:—Allow me to offer a few remarks on that anonymous communication from Simsbury which appeared in your issue of Dec. 5th. Your correspondent like a true Mason, would have your readers believe that the first lecture, that on Sunday evening, contisted of mere personal abuse. Now, allow me to say that I simply proposed to show that Masonry professes to be and what it is. Nor did I give either "Cowans" or seceding Masons as my witnesses, but adhering Masons of the highest standing. What I proved by such witnesses was: first, that Masonry professes to be very good; second, that it is very bad, so bad that it is essentially and designedly anti-Christian, even to the extent of rejecting the Bible and the God of the Bible. And if an opportunity shall be offered, I pledge myself to prove all this to the good people of Hartford.

As my authority for doing all this, I gave Ezekiel xxxiii. 7-9, also my ordination vows; and as a description of the enemy concerning whose approach, I sounded the warning, I gave 2d Peter ii. 1-3. On the two following evenings I simply gave and explained the three first degrees of Masonry, so-called, still proving the divulgences by Masonic authorities, especially the true Masonic Chart or Hieroglyphic Monitor (New Haven, J. C, Gray, printer. Engravings by Companion A. Doolittle, 1820.) If this is personal, or offensive to any one, the lecturer is not responsible for it. Masonry must take the blame as I then said.

Your correspondent is not any more truthful in his representations of the events of those evenings. "The young boys" did not "put any questions to the speaker," but a Mason, said to be the Master of the lodge at Tariffville, came forward at the close of the second lecture, accompanied by another Mason, and desired to see "that book," namely, the "Chart" above named; and when I showed it, he seized it with both hands and attempted to pull it from me, but did not succeed. At the same instant I was surrounded by a crowd, not of boys, but of men whose actions justify me in saying that most of them were "rude fellows of the baser sort." It was at this time that Mr. Philip Bacon rushed into the crowd, and when the Master Mason asserted that he was never known to tell a lie, this "right bower," as your correspondent calls him, replied, "I know Masons will lie." It is true that on the third evening, just when I was commencing the divulgencies in the second degree "a horrid and suffocating stench arose," but it is not true that "the assembly were dismissed" then, not true that "thus ended the third lesson." No, but the proceedings were suspended till the "horrid stench" was removed, after which I gave the second and third degrees of the vile thing that is still more horrid than was that stench. At the close, the same Master Mason came forward and attempted to justify what he called "that Christless prayer." But having given an opportunity before closing, and no one responded, I now refused to notice him. A crowd again gathered around him, and a missile just then struck and wounded my face, causing the blood to flow. All this was the work of Masons, not boys, as your correspondent would have the people believe. JOHN LEVINGTON.

To prove that I was not far from right in charging Masons with falsehood, this same Master Mason referred to by Bro. Levington was heard to tell a brother Mason as soon as they got outside the hall "that if he had got that book into his possession he (meaning the lecturer) would never read from it again." Further comment is unnecessary. I would add that on the Sunday following Bro. L. preached in the M. E. church, at Unionville, and on Monday morning one of the stewards of that church, a Mason, remarked that it was as good preaching as he ever heard, (or something to that effect,) and on Tuesday after he had heard the first lecture he could hardly find words in the English language to express his disgust of the man who had preached so well on Sunday.

I add a letter which I had sent to me signed by eleven of the citizens of that village all of whom are men of prominence and character. Yours,

P. BACON.

"The undersigned, having listened with great interest and satisfaction to a course of Anti-masonic lectures by the Rev. John Levington, at Unionville, Conn., Dec., 1874, desire to express to him their gratitude for his valuable services, and their high appreciation of his exceedingly able and candid and conclusive exposition of the subject in hand. They also take pleasure in commending Mr. Levington most sincerely to the confidence and esteem of all who desire to learn from its own charts and authenticated literature what Masonry really is."

In another letter Bro. Bacon writes:

"I will here say that I find it necessary to give away so many books to ministers and others whom it is important to inform, that it takes all my profits. But I do not complain, but do thank the Lord daily that he has given me an opportunity to labor for him in this great work, and that he has given me a heart to do it. I have been spending all my time for three weeks past making appointments for Mr. Levington to lecture, and attending to other matters. I find that I cannot give the time and energy necessary while doing this to canvass for the paper, but assure you that I shall do what I can and hope to average one a week for the next year.

I arranged for Bro. L. to preach in the Congregational church at Derby last Sunday, and probably for a course of lectures. All the hinderance when I left there was to get a hall, which I have no doubt has been arranged by the earnest friends there. I had from Bro. Isaac I. Gilbert a hearty Christian welcome, and at his home I was kindly entertained, and went on my way rejoicing in the fact of one common brotherhood of all Christ's people and a united desire to serve him in trying to help in the advancement of this cause among men. Bro. Gilbert is a veteran in the Anti-masonic work, having been drilled and commissioned in the Morgan times, which he has not forgotten. He is a true son of the Revolutionary Fathers, who left their ploughs standing in the fields to attend to a higher duty. He has also been a faithful worker in the temperance cause and has endured much persecution for so doing. He is one of the strong pillars of the M. E. church in Birmingham. I also met Mr. W. H. Swift, of the Congregational church, who gave me good encouragement, and from whom we may expect much.

I also went to Watertown and Bethlehem and found in each of those towns earnest friends, but I could not make the necessary arrangements for lectures. But I can truly say that I have not been in a town but that I have found some earnest friends of our cause. I have arranged for lectures at Bristol next week where we may expect that great good will be done.

I expect to leave home to-morrow looking for friends of the cause and making appointments for lectures. I desire that Connecticut, my native State, may not be backward in this great work. Yours, P. BACON.

A Sermon Starts Discussion in Genesee Co., Mich.

GOODRICH, Mich., Dec. 19, '74.

Editor Cynosure:

DEAR SIR:—We had an Anti-masonic sermon delivered here last Sabbath in the Congregational church by Elder Goodrich. of Hadley. He is a smart man and has been long in this country known as a good Christian minister. The meeting-house was filled, and there was quite a number of Masons and jacks present who were much offended. Some say they will withdraw their pledge for the support of the ministry, unless the house is shut against Anti-masonic meetings. But if there are any black sheep in the flock let them get out, it will make the white wool the purer. The amount signed by such men is but a drop in the bucket, and will be made up by others who want the house opened for discussion on these secret oath-bound clans. I can safely say that from my own knowledge.

I would to-day that the people would rise up as they did after Morgan was abducted and put every Mason out of office. I can well remember the time when the town I lived in would not even have a Mason path-master. But now some say you might as well be still; Masonry has such a hold upon the government that you can't do anything with it. Mr. McNeil said to me the day before Elder G's sermon, "You must be smart in getting Elder Goodrich here to preach on Masonry! What are you going to do? Do you think you are going to accomplish anything towards putting down Masonry?" I said, "My vote would count one towards it." Said he, "Have you not read that this world is to melt with fervent heat some day?" I thought I had. "Well," said he, "when this world melts with fervent heat Masonry will cease to be and not before." "Mr. M.," I replied, "that was just what you said about slavery. But where is slavery now? It has gone where Peck's bees went, and I hope Masonry will soon be on its track.

I asked a few Masons to come to hear the Elder. They answered, No. we'll not go a step. But if you will get a Mason to preach against Masonry we will all go and hear him. I think therefore, Mr. Editor, we need D. P. Rathbun here very much. I think he will find business in this part of Michigan for some time as well as in the parts he has been visiting. I long to see this vile institution put down.

Yours for the truth,

M. LISCOMB.

Shall We Have a Banner Company?

CLARK'S COTTAGE ON THE HILL SIDE, DANSVILLE, N. Y., Dec. 21, 1874.

DEAR BROTHER:—Your kind letter is received and I am right glad to hear the Cynosure has begun to pay its way, and something more. Certainly the ability of the paper and the great importance of the cause to which it is devoted entitle it to a wide circulation, and a generous support. I am now sending it to several persons, but will make this proposition to its friends: I will be one of one hundred persons to select five among my acquaintances who ought to read the Cynosure and send it to them for a year—beginning about the first of January; and send ten dollars to the office for the same. This will at once add five hundred to its list of readers and ten hundred dollars to its funds. Of course they may get this number—five each—of paying subscribers if they choose. Now in this case, brethren,

YOU MAY ALL SPEAK AT ONCE!

May we not see this bright array of names in the next number? As soon as the one hundred pledges are received, each shall send his five names and the ten dollars which shall be acknowledged in the Cynosure.

NOW FOR THE ONE HUNDRED! With kind regards, Yours truly,

GEO. W. CLARK.

P. S.—What say you, brother Hard, and and such heroes?

Our Politics.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

I see by your issue of Nov. 19th that some of your readers are protesting against publishing any thing in reference to politics. Now in my opinion it seems to me that our present political organizations need reforming. And I understand you claim not to ignore any reform in the columns of your paper. Therefore I do not see why any of the readers of the Cynosure should find fault with your pointing out the corruption that now exists in our present political organizations; and asking the people to take up issues which in your judgment and in the judgment of the majority of your readers, are honest. We need honest men; men who do not go to church on the Sabbath for the purpose of hiding six days of sin; men that do not ask you to vote for them so that they can steal the taxes you pay; men that court honesty and virtue, instead of fame and aggrandizement,—such are the men that we want to hold the offices of our country. And when you find such, you will find them free from cliques, rings and dishonest societies; ready to serve their country as they would that servants should serve them.

Now it seems to me to be the duty of Christian papers to point out honest men and honest issues, and ask the people to sustain these men and issues regardless of any partizan feeling. I do not mean that a Christian newspaper should advocate the pet doctrines of any party; but I mean this: that no paper should be afraid to advocate honest politics, honest religion, honest science, and in fact honest everything. That does not lead the people from the church or from Christ, but it has a tendency to keep the church purified as well as the ballot-box. I say by all means to your readers do not find fault with this or any other paper or even with any person for advocating honest political issues.

Reasons for the Earl of Ripon's Perversion to Papacy.

LONDON, Ont.

It is well-known that Queen Victoria's right to the throne of Great Britain was doubtful; but all doubts on this subject have been dispelled by the success which has hitherto attended her reign. There can be little doubt, but that the Prince of Wales, having the prestige of his Royal mother, will have quiet possession at her demise, if not previously, should the Queen resign in his favor. The latter is not now probable.

The nation has been quietly taking the measures of "The coming King." He has been "weighed in the balance, and found wanting." The British nation will not, knowingly, permit a king to sit upon that throne, who has sworn allegiance to a power alien and superior to her Magna Charta. The Christian Cynosure has shown the world that the Prince of Wales has done so, and that as Grand Master of the lodge in England he would be obliged to shield the murderer of his own mother from capital punishment, were that murderer a Royal Arch Mason. It is plain then that Great Britain will never allow a perjurer to rule over her, "knowing him to be such." The Prince of Wales then, must either renounce his claim to the crown of Great Britain and Ireland, or renounce Freemasonry. But it is not likely he will do the latter. He may have lively work yet for the fraternity before they "go to refreshment," when he sits on the throne.

The Earl of Ripon, foreseeing this, has wisely vacated the Grand Master's seat in the Orient, to the Prince of Wales. As all the males in the Royal family have abandoned their right to reign in favor of the Masonic lodge. Then the Earl of Ripon it is said is next in kin to the throne. He has chosen the patronage of Rome to that of the Ancient Lodge. He will have, therefore, in case of emergency, the influence of the High church, or dominent party in the church of England, which is already in firm league with Rome, backed by the power of all England.

In either case, Beelzebub will claim his supreme right to rule over Britain and Ireland. Either by his favorite fraternity, the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, or by his Vicegerent the Pope of Rome. But if they squirm at either alternative, what then? Must the people seek their own government; and the heart of the fathers be turned to the children, even the rebellious colony for wisdom to guide her in her dark hour? May God guide her aright. May Jesus take command and greatly advance his own cause for it is his right to rule the nations, in wisdom, truth, and justice, by the law of the Gospel. J. DONALDSON.

OUR MAIL.

Titus C. Briggs, Chickasaw, Ia., writes:

"The mystic wires of Masonry extend from the Atlantic to the Pacific. From the Gulf of Mexico to the frozen lakes of the north. The pulpit, the press, the legislative halls, the juror's bench and all parts of the national enterprise feel its power. I hope you will be able to stand firm and unshaken in the defense of the truth, the whole truth.

'High bear the banner, never fear;
Stand for the truth, for help is near.
God is your shield, then do not yield
Valiant in fight, you'll win the field.'"

B. B. Palmer, Walnut, Ill., writes:

"I would like to have a State Agent come to our place and deliver a course of lectures. We need it much, but I want timely notice."

Martin Allen, Randolph, Ill., writes:

"I am an old reformer and will do what I can. Our business men are afraid to take your paper; they read mine with pleasure. I have sowed some seed in sending tracts and papers to others. Your paper stands next to our church paper with us, the American Wesleyan."

D. F. Beatty, Washington, N. J., writes:

"I find by experience, for I have tried it, that the sights, grips, etc., in the Morgan book you sent me are correct. Go ahead. You are on the right track. 'God is your helper.'"

Isaac Bancroft, Monroe, Wis., writes:

"Secret societies have nearly destroyed the Congregational church in this place. . . . But I am happy to say that wicked men and devils are under God's control and government, and can go no farther than he permits for the good of his cause and people. . . . I am going to try and become a life member of your National Association, sometime next year. I understand there is a move to organize a State society in Wisconsin. I hope the Lord will speed the day when this will be done."

Israel Foster, Beverly, Mass., writes:

"I am, and have been, for forty years, opposed to secret societies."

Rev. C. M. Damon, Havana, Minn., writes:

"I observed November 8th on my circuit preaching three times on Masonry, etc., at different points. One brother, in closing prayer, thanked God for saving him from Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship, and the grange."

David Foreman, Milton, Ill., writes:

"I will say to any lecturer that will visit our county I will see that he gets a house to lecture in in the most prominent places in the country, and I will see that he is conveyed from place to place."

We will send your letter to Rev. H. H. Hinman and he will go if he can, without doubt.

Aaron Floyd, Pittsburgh, Pa., writes:

"Let me tell you that General Grant is not a Mason. Neither is General Babcock, nor Bristow, but Mullett, the superintending architect, is. I think we had better not nominate until the other parties nominate, and it will be an inducement to nominate Freeman."

M. Cagley, Bradford, Ia., send three new subscriptions and renews his own, and writes:

"I have distributed every paper I have had. We are in a bad Masonic hole here, but I think I can pick up a new subscriber once in a while."

Will you not send us three more subscriptions and take your place in that "new regiment?"

Martin Cochran, Washington, Ia., writes:

"I don't want the Cynosure to ever stop its glorious work."

A. C. Reed, Albion, O., writes:

"My wife is still sick, and my health is very poor, but I will do all I can for the best paper in the land."

B. F. Ballard, Westfield, Ind., writes:

"I shall fight secrecy during life. Let us work for the destruction of the works of darkness, and for the establishment of Christ's kingdom in these ends of the earth."

L. B. Skeel, Florid, Ill., writes:

"Please mark me a life subscriber. I do not want to miss a paper on any account, if possible to avoid it. I will attend to those petitions you sent me."

(He sends one new subscription.) Can you not send five more and be enrolled in the new regiment now forming?

H. S. Kirk, formerly of Deerlick, O., writes:

"I am now engaged as Principal of Alvarado Academy, in Indiana."

We hope he will do much toward forming educated Christian character in his new field of labor.

Philip Bacon, Weatogue, Ct., writes:

"I think that in a few months there will be friends found in Connecticut who will open their hearts and hands to help forward this great work. My faith is strong in God and in the power of his might to work in the hearts of men."

Rev. D. B. Douglass, Lewiston, N. Y., writes:

"I must have the Cynosure. I honor and revere its editor. I love its principles and its spirit. I love the service of its truth. May God help and bless it in its noble work, till every dark abomination of secrecy shall be swept from our land and the world."

Rev. J. A. Morehouse, Portland, Ind., writes:

"I have not been able to send you any new subscribers directly (but have been the means of getting several.) I hope ere long to send you at least one."

Eliza Bradbury, Owego, N. Y., writes:

"My heart is fully in the cause. I am sorry that I cannot do more for it. I consider it of vast importance that the light should be spread. It is greatly needed here, and everywhere. . . I thank God that he has raised up such a noble band of faithful men to oppose and put them down. God is in the work, and you will prosper. . . I intend to do what little I can to help it forward."

N. B. Briggs, Stevensville, Pa., writes:

"I am what is called a strong Anti-mason. May the Lord hasten the time when all secretism shall come to an end. I am circulating the petitions, but find it slow work. I find a good many Ephraims joined to their idols."

Michael Artman, Hillsdale, Mich., writes:

"I enclose you $2.20 to pay for one of the best papers I ever took (the Christian Cynosure.) I am past seventy-four, but still I read it."

Charles R. Tuttle, Indianapolis, Ind., writes:

"I trust I shall always take it (the Cynosure.) Both my wife and self are delighted with its contents every week."

J. N. Adair, McAlvey's Fort, Pa., writes:

"I am one of the first subscribers and intend to stick to it, and will send all the new subscribers I can get."

S. A. Lee, Manteno, Ill., writes:

"I saw in the Cynosure an announcement that the Rev. H. H. Hinman has planned a lecturing campaign on the Illinois Central; and that he is contemplating, if nothing prevents, to be at Manteno about January 11th, 1875. Now this is just what we want. The Anti-masonic element is not very large, yet I think such a lecture will do some good. We will entertain him and get funds enough to pay his expense and perhaps something more. . . Mr. C. A. Spring, my grandfather, is away from home, but he will rejoice to hear of this."

President Grant has at length become satisfied of the insurrectionary nature of the Vicksburg troubles, and on application of the Mississippi Legislature makes proclamation to the turbulent spirits of that city to go home and submit to the laws. The race issue has been pending there for months, if not years. The colored men have for eight years been in the ascendency, and, it is represented, have squandered the public funds to which they contributed little. Whatever the quarrels in the past it was possible to settle them without mobs and murder. No investigation by authority has yet been ordered, but no doubt Governor Ames justly attributes the difficulties to the secret Leagues. He has stated publicly his belief that the troubles in Vicksburg are but the first steps towards the killing and driving out of the State of all prominent Republicans by White Leaguers, and the assistance of the general government is necessary.

LORD BACON never said a truer thing than when he asserted that nations, in their onward progress in civilization, began with erecting stately edifices, and ended with highly cultivated gardens. Some twenty years ago I made a tour through some of the Western States, and drove through towns and cities and their suburbs, to see the well-kept and finished gardens and grounds. But I was disappointed. The gorgeous palaces were not wanting, but the surroundings were rough, bare, or unpolished. But these things are of the past—a brighter era of refined horiculture has dawned. Civilization, according to Lord Bacon's criterion, is advancing; and the substantial charms and refining influences of the garden are becoming widely and rapidly diffused.

Joshua iii. 14-17.—Commit to memory verse 17.

14 And it came to pass, when the people removed from their tents, to pass over Jordan, and the priests bearing the ark of the covenant before the people;

15 And as they that bear the ark were come unto Jordan, and the feet of the priests that bear the ark were dipped in the brim of the water, (for Jordan overfloweth all his banks all the time of harvest.)

16 That the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon an heap very far from the city Adam, that is beside Zaretan; and those that came down toward the sea of the plain, even the salt sea, failed, and were cut off: and the people passed over right against Jericho.

17 And the priests that bear the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan, and all the Israelites passed over on dry ground, until all the people were passed clear over Jordan.

GOLDEN TEXT.—When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee.—Isa. xliii. 2.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—The Lord's presence secures the safety of his people.

BIBLE READINGS.—(1) Ps. lxxviii. 52-72; (2) Num. x. 29-36; (3) Ex. xiv. 21-31; (4) Ps. cxiv. 1-8; (5) 2 Kings ii. 6-14; (6.) Deut. xi. 22-32; (7) Josh. iii. 14-17.)

[Place.—Jordan valley, near Jericho. Time.—About 1450 B. C.]

This miracle must have made a deep impression upon those who saw it. The fulness of the narrative, as far as possible, puts us in the place of on-lookers.

Analysis.—I. The Crossing of Jordan. [1] The time; at the wheat harvest, the river high, overflowing its banks. [2] The mode, the priests bearing the ark, going before the people. II. The lesson at the time. [1] To Joshua, an assurance of God's presence. [2] To Israel, that God was with Joshua. [3] To the Canaanites, that here was a power they could not withstand. III. Lessons to us; God works miracles for sufficient moral reasons; miracles are not wonders, but have some useful purpose.

Special Lessons.—[1] In passing thro' great sorrows or dangers, the Lord's presence gives safety. [2] When we dread such dangers, our eyes are to turn to the Lord. [3] Christ with us, in passing through death.

Topics for Study.—The eastern border of the land—breadth of Jordan usually—its condition at this time—why cross now—the Lord's directions—former guidance—present means of guidance—who bore the ark—where they stood—the effect on the waters—the appearance presented—the moral effect—on the people—on Joshua—on the Canaanites—the lessons we may learn—nature of a miracle—use of it—more than a wonder—encouragement to us—ark standing for what—the need we have—the provision we have—in life—in death.—Am. S. S. Union Series.

—The teacher should strive to make himself agreeable. Anything uncouth or offensive should be avoided. True courtesy and politeness should be cultivated. I once knew a man whose piety and learning were all neutralized before his class by a very offensive breath. Poor man! He did not know it; but the boys really disliked to sit very near him, even when he was repeating sweet Scripture promises and breathing out an interesting story. Some teachers are shabby in their clothing; some harsh and dictatorial in their manner; some peevish and easily provoked; some haughty and assuming; some so tr fling and boisterous as to sacrifice all respect.—*Pres. Forty Years Ago.

Dalcho Reviewed by Henry Dana Ward, 1829.

We parted from this wonder of the mystery, at the point where the Grand Consistory of Paris put their names to the commission of brother Stephen Morin, constituting him "Sovereign Inspector-General over all the lodges of Sublime and Perfect Masons, chapters, councils, colleges, and consistories of the Royal and Military Art of Freemasonry, in the new world!"

Brother Morin, to take possession of his extensive empire, landed at St. Domingo, in the West Indies, where he by the Majesty that was in him, appointed a Deputy Sovereign Inspector-General for all North America. "This high honor," says the circular of the Sublime and Puissant Sovereigns, "was conferred on brother M. M. Hayes,* with the power of appointing others when necessary." p. 71.

"Brother Hayes appointed brother Isaac Da Costa, Deputy Inspector-General for the State of South Carolina, who in the year 5787, (1783) established the Sublime Grand Lodge of Perfection in Charleston." Here is the important matter which the Sublime Sovereigns have issued this circular to communicate, viz: The account of the establishment of the Sublime Grand Lodge of Perfection in South Carolina. See 2d page of the circular.

"The names of the Masonic degrees are as follows, viz:—

1st, Entered Apprentice; 2d, Fellow Craft; 3d, Master Mason; 4th, Secret Master; 5th, Perfect Master; 6th, Intimate Secretary; 7th, Provost and Judge; 8th, Intendant of the Building; 9th, Elected Knights of Nine; 10th, Illustirious Elected of Fifteen; 11th, Sublime Knight Elected; 12th, Grand Master Architect; 13th, Royal Arch; 14th, Perfection. [One would suppose it were time to stop at this degree; but it is only the fourteenth stop in the Sublime Grand Sovereign's ladder, and nineteen steps are above the Degree of Perfection! This is genuine Freemasonry, that began with time and reaches perfection before it is half finished.] 15th, Knight of the East; 16th, Prince of Jerusalem; 17th, Knight of the East and West; 18th, Sovereign Prince of the Rose; 19th, Croix de Heroden; 19th, Grand Pontiff; 20th, Grand Master of all Symbolic Lodges; 21st, Patriarch Noachite or Chevalier Prussian; 22d, Prince of Libanus; 23d, Chief of the Tabernacle; 24th, Prince of the Tabernacle; 25th, Prince of Mercy; 26th, Knight of the Brazen Serpent; 27th, Commander of the Temple; 28th, Knight of the Sun; 29th, K. H. 30, 31, 32 Prince of the Royal Secret, Prince of Masons; 33d, Sovereign Grand Inspector Gen'l." "Besides these degrees, which are in regular succession, most of the Inspectors are in possession of a number of detached degrees, given in different parts of the world, and which they generally communicate free of expense to those brethren who are high enough to understand them, such as select Masons of 27, and the Royal Arch as given under the Constitution of Dublin. Six degrees of Maconnaric d' Adoption, Compagnon Ecossais; le Maitre Ecossais, et le Grand Maitre Ecossais, &c. &c., making in the aggregate 53 degrees."

The puissant Sovereigns of South Carolina added ten new degrees to the Sublime Grand Lodge in 1816. (Freemason's Library, p. 317.) The original state of the Sublime degrees, however, is not altered; not at all. Freemasonry can find the way to make 33 and 34 equal and the same; and the very Perfection one reached at degree 14 in 1808, the same with the Perfection attained in degree 24 of 1816. A little sleight of hand will do this; and the mistress of the faculty of Abrac is never at a loss. She named in this grand circular 33 degrees and 20 collateral degrees, making an aggregate of 53 degrees; and now, since 1816, ten of the collateral are removed into the direct line, the aggregate remaining the same. That is a slight change, one would think: like taking the outer courts of an edifice, and putting three stories higher up on the top. It is, however, the same building yet; though the Sublime Sovereign's expression would be rather strong applied to this case, when they say, p. 117, "Not the smallest alteration or addition has been made to the Sublime Degrees, &c.

The names of the new degrees are worth having, to make the present system of the Sublime Sovereigns complete: all the changes made are between the Master's degree and the degree of Perfection, which latter is elevated from the 14th of the former to the 24th degree of the latter system. The degrees added are 4th, the Mark Master; 5th, Past Master; 6th, Most Excellent Master; 8th, Royal Master; 9th, Knight of the Red Cross; 10th, Knight of Malta; 11th, Knight of the Holy Sepulcher; 12th, Knight of the Christian Mark; 13th, Knight Templar; 23d, Knight of the 9th Arch; which brings us to Perfection at the 24th degree.

"The committee respectfully submit to the consideration of the Council, the above report on the principles and the establishment of the Sublime degrees in South Carolina, extracted from the archives of the society. They cannot, however, conclude without expressing their ardent wishes for the prosperity and dignity of the institutions over which this Supreme Council presides; and they flatter themselves, that if any unfavorable impressions have existed among their brethren of the Blue degrees from a want of the knowledge of the principles and practices of Sublime Masonry, it will be done away; and that harmony and affection will be the happy cement of the Universal Society of Free and Accepted Masons: that, as all aim at general improvement of the condition of mankind by the practice of virtue, and the exercise of benevolence, so they sincerely wish, that any little differences, which have arisen, in unimportant ceremonies, of Ancient and Modern, may be reconciled, and give way to the original principles of the order, those great bulwarks of society, universal benevolence and brotherly love, and that the extensive fraternity of Freemasons, throughout the two hemispheres, may form but one band of brotherhood. "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for the brethren to dwell together in unity."

"They respectfully salute your Grand Council, by the Sacred Numbers.

"Charleston S. C. the 10th day of the 8th mo. called Chisleu, 5553, A. B. 580*d*, and of the Christian Era, this 4th Dec. 1802.

"Frederick Dalcho, K. H. P. R. S. Sovereign Grand Inspector General of the 33d, and Lieutenant Grand Commander in the U. S. A.

"Isaac Auld, K. H. P. R. S. Sovereign Inspector General of the 33d.

"E. De La Motta. K. H. P. R. S. Sovereign Grand Inspector General of the 33d, and Illustrious Treasurer General of the H. Empire."

Thus ends the extraordinary report of this Masonic committee. Their worthy names deserve to be remembered; and their mysterious title would undoubtedly assist the memory, could it be unravelled. K. H. P. R. S! what can that mean? Surely these letters are the initials of the 29, 30, 31 and 32 degrees of Sublime Freemasonry. P. R. S.—Prince of the Royal Secret. This is clear; but K. H.—what is K. H? Be patient reader, it is too blasphemous to unfold at once: we shall presently see what it means. Treasurer General of the H. Empire? I have a work, "Hermes," approved in its principles by the Grand Lodge of France, which, with less modesty, calls this Masonic dominion, "Le St. Empire," the holy empire! E. De La Motta, Knight of the Holy Ghost!!! Prince of the Royal Secret!! Sovereign Inspector General of 33d, and Illustrious Treasurer General of the Holy Empire!

Be astonished, O reader! Let your heart misgive you! Withhold your belief; nay, declare, positively, that innocent Freemasonry is abused by this interpretation of her honorary capitals; and then know that the explanation here given to K. H. is copied from the Sublime Sovereigns themselves: and although they are false, this reading of K. H. is strictly true. (See Freemason's Library, Baltimore, 1826, p. 317.)

"Doth a fountain send forth at the same place, sweet water and bitter? Can the fig-tree, my brethren, bear olive berries? either a vine figs? So can no fountain both yield salt water and fresh."—St. James, chap. 3.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, DEC. 31, 1874.

CHRISTMAS.—This strange festival which has spread over the country like other human religious institutions, is evidently losing ground. Religious papers which used to bloom all over with Christmas blosoms, this year content themselves with a meagre greeting. Other papers, like the Boston Christian are ominously silent, and some which have never spoken before argue strongly against it, as unscriptural and un-American.

HERESY.

"Who shall privily bring in damnable heresies, denying the Lord that bought them." "A man that is an heretic after the first and second admonition reject." These once familiar words, we believe, still stand in our Bibles. But in these broad-gauge times the writers inspired of God would be respectfully bowed out of good society by the liberal teachers of to-day, if they ventured to apply such utterances as the above, in the care of our churches.

It would be a curious study, could one trace out and exhibit the forces which have swung back the popular mind from straining out the gnats of heresy, to swallowing its camels. Time was, when the presence of a Greek iota in an adjective describing the nature of Christ, was deemed a badge of orthodoxy; parties were formed, and men actually fought and bled upon the question whether Christ's substance was similar to the Father's or the same. In those days, provinces in Europe were thinned by the execution and banishment of witches.

In the United States, where but nineteen supposed witches were hung before the fetters of European superstition had fallen off, we have swung to the opposite solstice from superstition and over-belief, till the minister suspected of having convictions of truth which he means to abide by, is an unpopular man.

Dr. Schaff, who visited Germany in the interest of "The World's Evangelical Alliance," reported the present German Emperor as saying, "Tell the Americans to beware of superstition and unbelief,—the two worst enemies of mankind." And they are indeed two extremes of error, which have no midland of truth between them. Representatives of Romish priests and German infidels sat together in the Cincinnati School Board and voted the Bible, and all other religious books and songs out of the common schools. Hosts of broad-gauge Christians cried, "Amen: Let the Bible be put out." Bishop McQuaid, now in the same State, assails the public school system as godless and irreligious. We shall see the same "liberal" persons, having so far as in them lies, put the Word of God out of the national schools, consent to slip in the word of a priest in its place.

There is one thing the heart of man naturally hates,—that is, God. "Now have they seen and hated both me and my Father," is the testimony of Christ himself; and hence false belief is popular one day, and no belief the next. One would think the absurdity of one sitting down to the communion table, who believes Christ Jesus to have been only a man, now dead and gone, like Alexander or Cæsar, to be simply transparent. How can such persons "discern the Lord's body" in the bread, and his blood in the cup, when he was no "Lord;" and his body and blood are long ago blown away in gases or still lie in ashes where he fell, and went to decay? And yet we could name half a dozen papers, professedly Christian, which hail the communing together of Unitarians, Universalists and orthodox as a sign of the coming millennium!

Such periods have again and again passed over Christendom and have always left desolation in their track. We are now in one of them; and the two ghosts, superstition and infidelity, are dancing a reel before the popular mind till its brain whirls, and the same man with the most whimsical solemnity one hour prays to the god of the lodge, and the next, as the French did, says with the fool's heart, "There is no God."

The Spaniard had a double revenge, who made his victim disown Christ, and then stabbed him to the heart; and a similar fate awaits any nation whose churches teach and whose altars guard no truth of God. "The church of the living God is the pillar and ground of the truth;" and when it ceases to be that, it is nothing: and the civil law becomes nothing but the bludgeon of a giant, and a blind giant at that.

PROHIBITION.

We acknowledge the receipt of a number of circulars, including the Temperance Platform, devoted to the cause of prohibition. (See extract in another column.) That the sale of intoxicating drams to men in health at public dram-bars, is destructive of good order, and, as such, should be prohibited by law, is believed by all intelligent persons who have acquainted themselves with the facts. If civil government is to be kept up, crime repressed, and the public peace maintained, prohibitory law is as necessary as fire-engines in cities for the protection of the population.

In the platform put forth by the committee appointed at Oberlin, Ohio, temperance was one plank, and the Sabbath was another. Now that the New York theaters are in full blast every Sabbath, the secular press begins to be alarmed lest society should be disintegrated and break down, in our large cities, under the weight of its corruptions. The friends of the various reforms must unite as an "American Party" with the ideas of the Declaratiod of Independence for their platform; and the natural zeal for humanity in the human breast will repeat its triumphs over political chicanery, selfishness and ambition, as it did in the American Revolution and in our national struggle against slavery. That "truth is mighty and must prevail," is a trite maxim but a true one.

THE DEGRADATION OF THE SABBATH.

In strong and pleasing contrast with the bold attacks of German infidels, the vapidity of Mr. Beecher, or the covert antagonism of its namesake in Chicago is the following from the New York Tribune on the question lately agitating that city. It does not aspire to a religious argument, but defends the observation of that day as an American institution from the attacks of Europeanism. This is a question which we are likely in the near future to meet plainly and finally. It must be the duty of every pulpit and religious journal to thoroughly inform the churches on this issue. "Forewarned is forearmed." An honest testimony faithfully maintained and taught, will anticipate and remove the danger by evangelizing the elements that oppose Christianity and its ordinances. The Tribune says:

Without bringing into play any theological considerations whatever, we hold that it is against the public interests that the distinction between Sunday and the other days of the week should be abolished. It is only vicious vagrants and rich idlers who would suffer from the cessation of every-day life on Sundays, and their distress should call for no sympathy. For all others Sunday is a most valuable and salutary institution. It causes a break in the wearing and destructive pursuits of life. It changes those currents of busy thought which seems to have something corroding in them. It gives one day for the recuperation of the vital forces wasted in the preceding six. These are its obvious physical advantages, but incalculably greater are its moral. Despite the sneers of little wits, and the more redoubtable assaults of iconoclastic thinkers, the good which is done by regular church going is beyond computation. For an hour or two at least in every week the church goer is brought face to face with great and lofty thoughts, is forced to contemplate a series of images and symbols which have done more for the world than a thousand legions of soldiers could do, and is made to meditate with more or less earnestness upon his personal relations to his Creator and his fellow-men. There is no rule by which we can compute the sum of the result. The good resolutions formed, the evil purposes relinquished, the heart quickened to higher ends and softened to works of charity and kindness, on every Sunday in this country, are simply past our imagining. The music of thousands of bells that fill the air of the morning is an audible and evident expression of a common sentiment as it is enobling; but there is a far deeper harmony in the millions of prayers ascending at the same moment from the earth bearing the unutterable sorrows and aspirations of men.

It may be said that Sunday amusements will not interfere with the rest and the worship to which the day has hitherto been devoted. But it is a sufficient answer to this, first, that the prevalence of such amusements has a direct tendency to diminish church going, especially among the young, who could hardly be expected to resist the temptations held out to them by pleasures which appeal to their strongest inclinations. And secondly, if such amusements become general they will employ a vast number of persons, to whom Sunday will cease at once and finally to be a day of rest. The just instinct of irreligious people leads them to allow a certain degree of repose on Sundays to those whom they employ. The community ought to allow servants, who furnish its diversions, the same opportunity for rest and recreation. The little additional money they would earn by playing every night in the week would be but a poor compensation for what they would lose. In their interest as well as in that of the public good, we hope that the attempt to secularize our Sundays may not succeed. It is hostile to all our traditions. The Christian Sunday is as much an Anglo Saxon possession as trial by jury. It would be a national calamity to see it—we will not say desecrated but—degraded.

Newspapers and their Necessities.

For sometime before the enlargement of the Cynosure we received letters from friends containing the following sentiments. One wrote: "The Cynosure is doing good work now but I long to see it launching out into deeper water." Another would say: "The paper is too small for its price; it will not stand competition with larger papers." The publishers replied, "Make the paper pay expenses at its present size and we will try to give you a better one." Old friends did as well as they could and new ones came to the rescue, and the publishers kept their word and enlarged the paper without increasing the price. It was enlarged in April, and through the summer when many of our friends were too busy to do much for it it was published each month at a loss. In October the receipts were better than in September, and last month for the first time since the enlargement the receipts were sufficient to cover the current expenses; but in the mean time a debt of $1,334.31 has accumulated. Since the publishers lost all their capital in the great fire of 1871, except their good name and business reputation, you may justly imagine that they have not much capital to sink in the Cynosure. Were they ever so rich, however, they would not permanently continue to publish a paper which showed that it was not valued sufficiently to pay bare expenses at a reasonable price. Some have been led to think our subscription list was much larger than it is. (One erring brother, at least, circulated the report that our subscription list numbered from fifteen to twenty thousand). But the reason for justifying its enlargement was the opinion expressed by friends that by having the enlarged paper in hand, the subscription list could be doubled with ease. This, we trust, will soon be done. To show the great importance of this enlargement we quote the following from the Telescope of December 9th. The long experience of this paper as well as its character for integrity gives the quotation more than ordinary weight. . . "The wisdom of our church in authorizing only one paper and in resolving to make that highly respectable is shown by the fact that it is able, in these hard times, to enjoy a large weekly, while some patrons of papers are obliged to feel that the ground is yielding beneath them and their paper is going down. . . . . The way some religious papers are going may be inferred from the fate of a certain Baptist paper with a circulation of 7,500, which has the last few years fallen behind in its finances. 'The editor announces that the subscriptions and business have failed, by ten thousand dollars, to pay expenses, and that 'another four years of such failure' would put the concern from twenty to thirty thousand dollars in debt—an obligation the denomination could never meet."

Another Baptist paper, with 8,000 subscribers, failed last year to pay expenses by five thousand dollars.

The Reformed Church Messenger says:

During the thirty-four years' connection with the religious press, we have at no time passed through as trying an ordeal as that which has fallen to our lot during the last year and a half. We have experienced much discomfort on account of it, and have sometimes felt as though it would be impossible to keep matters afloat.

The Lutheran Observer says:

No first-class paper can be sustained in any of our large cities, either in the East or the West, with less than ten thousand subscribers at $3.00 a year or twenty thousand at $2.50 a year. And to this the Lutheran Observer, notwithstanding its economical management, is no exception.

It observes also the following, which even our people might read with great profit:

The supposition of the inexperienced and oversanguine, that even a second or third rate religious paper can be sustained by a few thousand subscribers, at the current rate for printing, paper, and editing, is utterly groundless. Experience and observation have demonstrated that none but the largest denominations can safely multiply their religious papers and sustain them in the different sections of our country; that even they have established more than they can properly support; and that denomination which cannot raise more than ten or fifteen thousand subscribers for a religious paper, and yet enters upon the experiment of multiplying them, will necessarily reap its legitimate consequences in entailing upon themselves a number of small, poor, and sickly journals, circumscribed in their circulation, weak in influence, and unequal to the demands of the age.

An honest expression of dissatisfaction at the undue multiplication of church papers ought not to be interpreted as fear of rivalry."

Impressed with the truth of the facts contained in the above quotations, we wrote the artitle found on the sixteenth page of the issue of October fifteenth entitled "THINGS DONE BY HALVES ARE NEVER DONE RIGHT," urging friends of the cause to see that the national organ of this movement was well supported before they turned aside to start new enterprises. We have received reproof from two friends recently (accompanied by no new subscriptions) who say we are pushing the paper too much. If any others feel so, we ask them to double our subscription list, (one man pays for five thousand copies of a religious paper published in New York, sent to different persons in the United States) and we will be less demonstrative. If this is asking too much please help us as much as you can, be charitable and we will try to improve, "growing wiser and better as time wears away."

NOTES.

—Thousands will read with grateful interest the testimony of the revered John Todd on our first page. As a feature of the New Year, we can promise our readers similar letters from Albert Barnes, Rev. D. T. Stoddart, Jeremiah Day, and Heman Humphrey, revered names in American history. A brief biographical sketch will accompany each so far as can be obtained.

—Friends in New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Indiana, will find items for them to note in the Notices and Reform News.

—The telegraph brings us word of the sudden death of Hon. Gerrit Smith, the well known philanthropist, on Monday. An attack of apoplexy and paralysis caused his death while visiting friends in New York. Mr. Smith was the first president of the New York State Association which has thus quickly lost two of its ablest men.

—The funeral of Rev. Adam Crooks took place in Syracuse on Friday, Dec. 18th, and was attended by a large number of ministers of the Wesleyan and other denominations and prominent citizens of the city, who sincerely mourned the loss of an honored citizen and beloved brother in Christ. A more extended notice of the occasion, and of the last labors of this truly great man, is necessarily postponed.

—Strange as it may appear, our faithful and excellent cotemporary, the Telescope, was represented in the late triennial meeting of the Knights Templars in New Orleans. It is on this wise: the foreman is a "Sir Knight," and must needs take a three weeks vacation to attend the Grand Encampment, to fortify himself no doubt against the prevailing sentiment surrounding his daily business life. The external appearance of the Telescope proves him a faithful workman; and our brother editors will agree that he is too good a man for the lodge and should not be impervious to the truth.

—Rev, Lyman Whiting, of Janesville, Wis., whose refusal to permit a Masonic funeral ceremony in his church a few years since was anathematized by all the lodges, has been nnanimously called to the pastorate of Plymouth Church, Philadelphia. A new house of worship is in process of erection, which is expected to be ready for use early in 1875.

Look sharp for business chances, such as new subscribers, signers to petition, or any one who can be enlisted in the reform.

The General Agent in Ohio.

IBERIA, O., Dec. 25, 1874.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Late on Friday afternoon, the 11th inst., we received word that brother J. P. Stoddard would lecture here on the evening of the 14th. We immediately put out posters, and during the short interval circulated the announcement extensively as possible. On Monday evening quite a respectable audience assembled in the College chapel, larger, indeed, than we had anticipated. The good order that prevailed and the apparently undivided attention showed that the lecture was truly appreciated by the hearers. This encouraged the brother, and he announced another lecture for the following evening. This evening the audience was much larger than on the previous occasion. The same deep interest was shown by the hearers. At the close of the lecture an opportunity was given for the craft to reply or ask any questions. But they remembered their obligations and kept their jewel. Brother Stoddard while here also distributed a number of pamphlets on Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship.

We think the lectures have been productive of much good. They have aroused an interest among the people, and awakened a spirit of investigation. This is what we want. If the people would investigate for themselves, all secret associations, especially Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship would soon die as the result of this shameful corruption.

The prominent members of the craft in this vicinity did not attend the lectures. Only one or two Entered Apprentice Masons were known to be present. The merchant of this place and who also keeps the post-office, was somewhat annoyed for some days subsequent to the lectures, by the discussions which they elicited, and which were carried on in his office. At last, finding it very difficult to keep his jewel, he positively denied the existence of Mackey's Manual, denied that Masons had ever written anything on the subject of Masonry, and peremptorily forbids the discussion of the subject in his office. They love the darkness and refuse to come to the light because their deeds are evil. May Bro. Stoddard or some other valiant soldier of this reform visit us frequently, is the present prayer of yours for the right,

J. A. RAMSAY.

JACKSONVILLE, Ill., Dec. 21, 1874.

DEAR BRO. K.—After speaking at Bloomington I returned to New Rutland where we had an excellent meeting in the Advent church. The untiring labors of Mrs. Proctor have accomplished much good in this place. From thence I went to Gridley where this subject had never been presented. I spoke in the Congregational church with the approval and sympathy of the pastor. From thence I went to Heyworth and spoke to a full house in the Southern Methodist Church. Our earnest co-laborer Mr. Wm. Ducker has not labored in vain, and though suffering from a severe and perhaps fatal disease will yet be permitted to see the fruit of his labor. Good Templarism here (quite needlessly) enters into the fight and invites the blows aimed at Freemasonry.

From here I went to Chapin in Morgan county, where I received a cordial greeting from our efficient friend, Mr. Samuel French, who is devoting more time and money to this work than all others in this part of the State. I found the Congregational church engaged, and my lectures entensively advertised, but just before our meeting was to commence Mr. French received word that the trustees had reconsidered their action, and that the church would be closed. The Methodist church was quickly engaged and for two evenings well filled with an attentive congregation, eager for the truth. I was assisted during the first evening by Rev. W. L. Manley, of Jacksonville, who made a short but most telling speech.

On Saturday evening I spoke at Concord in the Protestant Methodist church to a full house. The Odd-fellows adjourned in a body and came into the lecture and felt highly indignant at some criticism on their order. They emphatically denounced the teachings and laws of their own manuals and manifested a gross ignorance of their own order. By invitation of Rev. Mr. Mack I preached in the Congregational church in Chapin on Sabbath evening, and feel that a good work was done in that place.

I expect to speak to-night in Waverly and from there go to Randolph county. Rev's Inskip and McDonald are holding a series of meetings here in Jacksonville with important results. After they close there will be a call for lectures in this place.

H. H. HINMAN.

Notes from the Indiana Agent.

When lecturing at Noblesville more than eighteen months ago, a Masonic lawyer disputed an assertion made in the discourse to the effect that Masonry while pretending benevolence, excludes from membership, and hence from its benefits, all cripples. When I quoted from Webb's Masonic Monitor he laughed and branded my book as "spurious." Soon after I passed through Indianapolis, and called at the office of the Masonic Advocate, and while there fell into conversation with Martin H. Rice, who (though a small man, of moderate talent I should think), wears the somewhat "high-falutin" title of "M. W. P. G. M.," (Most Worshipful Past Grand Master,) and who is one of the editors of the Advocate. I asked if a cripple could legally be "made" a Mason. He answered "No, it is a violation of the ancient landmarks of Freemasonry, to make that man a Mason who is mutilated." "When I was Grand Master," he added, "I arrested the charter of of Centerville Lodge for making Col. Dudley, a one-legged man, a Mason. The Grand Lodge afterward took their charter from them." I have learned since that Col. Dudley lost his leg in his country's service.

Such is Masonry! Albert Pike, of Pea Ridge notoriety, the "Most Potent Grand Commander of the Supreme Council," with his headquarters at Washington, D. C., and the initiation of a crippled soldier disorganizing a lodge! Loyalty at a discount, and a premium on treason!

God save our land from Freemasonry, its worse than Southern foe!

The Home Circle.

The Old Year.

We have closed the book and laid it by;
And ever thus must its pages lie;
We cannot unclasp the lids again,
Nor write its record with brighter pen.

Ah, many the lines we would entrace—
And many the stains we would erase—
But the time has fled from us away,
We cannot recall a single day.

Our lives have not backward paths to tread;
The words we utter are ne'er unsaid,
We never can dream the self-same dream,
Nor reverse the onward flowing stream.

Oh! then let us in meekness now
Before our Maker in Heaven bow,
And pardon ask for every sin,
Which the closed book doth hold within.

And when another again we ope,
With its pure white pages full of hope,
May we look to him and humbly pray
For strength to keep it as pure each day.

The New Year.

Another year! another year
Has borne its record to the skies;
Another year! another year,
Untried, unproved before us lies;
We hail with smiles its dawning ray—
How shall we meet its final day.

Another year! another year!
Its squandered hours will ne'er return.
Oh! many a heart must quail with fear
O'er memory's blotted page to turn.
No record from that leaf will fade—
Not one erasure may be made.

Another year! another year!
How many a grief has marked its flight!
Some whom we love no more are here—
Translated to the realms of light.
Ah! none can bless the coming year
Like those no more to greet us here.

Another year! another year!
Oh! many a blessing, too, was given
Our lives to deck, our hearts to cheer,
And antedate the joys of heaven,
But they, too, slumber with the past,
Where joys and griefs must sink at last.

Another year! another year!
Gaze we no longer on the past,
Nor let us shrink with faithless fear,
From the dark shade the future casts.
The past, the future—what are they
To those whose lives may end to-day?

Another year! another year!
Perchance the last of life below;
Who ere its close Death's call may hear,
None but the Lord of life can know.
Oh! to be found, whene'er that day
May come, prepared to pass away.

Another year! another year!
Help us earth's thorny paths to tread;
So may each moment bring us near
To thee, ere yet our lives are fled.
Saviour, we yield ourselves to thee,
For time and for eternity.

A Sting of Life.

A PLEA FOR THE NEW YEAR.

"The sting of death is sin," said Paul; and Christendom assents to the statement. "The sting of life is sin," said the late Thomas Binney of London, and the sermon he preached from this text, again and again brought his audience to their feet, while strong men groaned with terror as he told the experiences of sinful hearts.

The sting of life is sin. It is that which has blighted and blasted fallen humanity, it is that which blights and blasts men now. It is sin that darkens life with untold gloom, and makes the sun of joy go down at noon. It is sin that dims the eye, furrows the brow, bends the form, breaks the heart! It is sin that makes strong men weak, and brave men cowardly, and which drives men from the heights of joy and honor to hide beneath refuges of lies, and creep like crawling things in mire and filth unspeakable. It is sin that blights youth, blasts manhood, and disgraces gray hairs. It is sin that hurls down the strongest and noblest, to be a hissing and a byword, the song of drunkards and the scoff of fools. Deep in the human heart is buried the fatal sting of sin. More fearful than exposure, than shame than punishment, is the clanking of the unseen chain, the galling of the unseen fetter, the rankling of the unseen dart, the secret consciousness of a soul estranged from God, possessed by evil, haunted by dark and guil y recollections, and feeling—under it may be a fair, a prosperous, a smiling, a sanctimonious outside—its own weakness, emptiness, hollowness, and bitterness, which no human hand can help or heal.

The sting of life is sin, and that sting is fatal. The end of those things is death. Sin when it is finished bringeth forth death. The wages of sin is death. Sin is the sting of death because it has been the sting of life. It drapes the future with darkness because it has clothed the present with gloom. The poison strikes deeper and deeper the farther it goes. Here it ruins reputation, health, vigor, enjoyment, intellect, and every moral excellence,—there it shall destroy both soul and body with an everlasting destruction.

Friend, the terrible mistake of your life-time, the sting of your existence is sin. And do you still covet, and desire, and enjoy it? Are you not satisfied with what you have tasted of the wormwood and gall? Have you not felt sin's sting long enough? Are you not weary of the hidden burden, the inward conflict, the secret fetter, the deadly sting? Are you not ready to part with sin,—to sacrifice its pleasures if you may thus escape its pains? Are you not ready to be helped by Him who is the only healer of the sting of sin—whose blood is the only antidote for its baleful power? If so, I bid you come and welcome, to the Lord who loves and saves the lost. To-day you may be freed from the sorrow and the sting of sin,—freed through the love of him who died upon the cross for you, and who lives to plead your cause before the throne. To-day he waits to bless, he bends to hear, he stoops to save. And shall he wait to plead in vain? Shall his voice which spake the words in order, and which marshalls all the host of heaven, fall upon your ears like an idle tale? Shall he whom all the angelic throngs adore, stand suppliant like before you, vainly pleading with you to live, and being spurned, rejected and despised? Shall he for whose smile all angels watch and wait, lavish entreaties, prayers, and tears on you, only to be repulsed with mad contempt by a creature dependant on him for life and every blessing? Shall he who abolished death, and who brought life and immortality to light for you, stand and entreat you to accept the boon, and yet his plea be in vain? The sting of life is sin, and the sting of death is sin; but thanks be to God that giveth us the victory both in life and in death, through our Lord Jesus Christ. But how shall we escape if we nelect so great a salvation? how shall we be saved if we reject the sinner's only Saviour and despise the mercy of the sinner's friend?—Selected.

Bring Another.

A French stoker explained his zeal for a certain work, by saying, that in a meeting room of a society to which he belonged, in his native place, there was a motto over the pulpit, "Bring another." The rule of the society was that every member had to bring a stranger to their meetings. This is a scriptural commentary on a scriptural command. At the close of the Apocalypse, are written the words, "The Spirit and the Bride say come, And let him that heareth say, come; and let him that is athirst, come. And whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." This teaches that every believer has a duty in bringing others to Christ; that not only preachers and teachers are required to spread the knowledge of Christ, but that every one that heareth, must say, "Come." It is merely the motto above the pulpit, "Bring another."

Let me urge the supreme importance of universal activity in forwarding the spread of the knowledge of Christ. It is not only of supreme importance to those we would influence, but to ourselves. Would you be safe, would you be bright Christians, I know of no other way than by working for Christ. Is redemption bestowed for our personal advantage? No; but for the glory of Christ. A Christian who does not work with this object in view, is as a knife that never cuts, a ship that never sails, or a plow that never turns the soil—a mere nonentity. There is an absolute necessity that every human being must be a worker before the world's redemption. The ministers alone cannot accomplish this work. The ministers only working, would be like a skeleton army composed of generals, captains and other officers, and which would be of little real use; the rank and file must be added to accomplish effective work.

Statistics teach us that the population of the world increases by multiplying, and this increase is constantly enlarging Satan's kingdom on earth. Every child born in this world is a member of this kingdom, and must be born again before it can enter the kingdom of God. Thus, the increase of Satan's kingdom is by multiplying. How does Christ's kingdom increase? Suppose that simply the ministers work; suppose that they are all successful; that not one proves unworthy, and every one brings souls to Christ; not to be under the mark, let us make each minister win twenty souls this year. In 1875 let them win twenty more souls each; that would be forty. Let them next year add twenty more, and every year the same number. This is an increase, and may be a large increase, but it is by addition, and that only. But you say this is hardly correct, because new ministers are every year being brought into the field. But how is this likely to be the case if the laymen do not work for Christ? But even this does not make matters very much better. Let us take two series of numbers, and let one increase by addition, and the other by multiplication; the latter will outrun the other. No matter how large the additions, the result in the end will be the same, and the farther you go on the more the difference will become apparent.

In this arithmetical statement you may see the exact state of the church of the present day. Christ's kingdom increases by addition; the devil's by multiplication; and the latter outnumbers the former. We boast of Protestent Christendom and of our progress, and yet the sad fact remains that there are more unsaved souls now in this guilty world this day than ever before; more than in the dark ages; and more than when Luther broke away from the superstitions that covered the church in his time. If things continue to go on in this way, the church may fold her hands and applaud at the increase in her numbers, and congratulate herself on her growth, but she is getting further and further away from the accomplishment of its object. The true way to do is to take a lesson from the French stoker and the command "Let him that heareth say, come." Then we will increase by multiplication. We will go back for a moment. The pastor last year gained twenty souls, this year twenty more, which makes forty, and next year another twenty, making in all sixty. But suppose that each of the converted ones takes the advice and brings another. In that case in 1875 there will be the minister's twenty, which with the twenty gained before makes forty, but add to this number the twenty gained by those converted last year. This makes sixty next year; to this sixty is to be added sixty, and the minister's twenty, and thus the number rises to one hundred and forty.† Don't you see how gloriously it grows? A rolling power is going on; we multiply as we go instead of add as before.

In this principle is the only possibility of the vast work of the redemption of the world through man's instrumentality. Well may Christian ministers faint as they view before them the work, they, single handed, are expected to accomplish. It is estimated that the population of the world is above one thousand millions, and it is increasing by hundreds of thousands in every decade, and every one of these is born a child of Satan. When we look around and see the population of the heathen countries, what a small proportion there appears to be left to Christians. A calculation has been made of the number of deaths, and it is estimated that if these deaths happened at regular intervals, there would be sixty to every minute in the hour, day and night all the year through. Every stroke of the pendulum is the knell of a departed spirit. Oh! when we think of the destiny of a lost soul, how tragical becomes the thought that while the heart beats once there has been a soul lost—the eternal death of the soul. Surely the heart shudders at the thought. Let the church only waken up and adopt our Saviour's rule, and the work though tremendous, will be done, and the angel of light will reconquer to hope and to life. Then will be realized the truth of the promise and injunction: "The Spirit and the Bride say come; and let him that heareth say come; and let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely."—Prof. Dabney.

† Upon the Author's hypothesis, which with the blessing of God is easily possible to believing effort, one missionary alone in the heart of Asia, at the end of twenty years, would have a flock of twenty million nine hundred and seventy-one thousand five hundred, (20,971,500) converted souls. Two ministers would bring the entire population of the United States to Christ in the same time. The ministry of the United States properly distributed would convert the world in this way in ten years. With such effort Isaiah lxvi. 8 would soon be realized.—Our Banner.

Rising above Discouragement.

There is always a way out of discouragement. Conviction that our course is right, constancy of purpose, an invincible determination never to submit or yield, and a calm reliance on Divine Providence may sustain us in a lofty attitude. If we will wait with patience for the element of time to work in our affairs, the difficulties may disappear of themselves, and we find a clear path where we had anticipated only insurmountable obstacles. While we are waiting we will find it easy to draw profitable lessons from the careers of the great men of the world, from the life of Frederick the Great, embraced in the seven years war, and from the history of William the Silent as given by Motley in his Rise of the Dutch Republic; and we may live over again with Washington the days of Valley Forge or conduct with Xenophon the Retreat of the Ten Thousand. They all are examples to us that we, through faith and patience, may inherit the kingdom of the brave, the resolute, the hopeful, the patient.

Discouragement oftenest overtakes those whose lives pass in the petty details of commonplace existence. The mother whose narrow round of duty confines her to the range of two or three rooms; the primary teacher whose life passes in the monotony of the school room; the mechanic whose days are filled with activity that never varies—these typical individuals find it hard to keep buoyant, hopeful, fresh and resolute. But this is just what they must do or dwindle into cyphers.

This current is not so difficult to set in motion as many people think. What must be done in daily life we all find time to do. Now put intellectual and moral growth among the "must's" and the current is started. Instead of suffering the mind, while busy with routine work, to dwell on trifles, on petty troubles, or to drift whither it will, let some subject of interest occupy it. The intellectual heroes of antiquity had few books, but they did a vast amount of thinking, and to good purpose. We live in the same world they did, and have in addition all the accumulated wisdom of the ages that have intervened to draw upon.

Of all things, when the mood of discouragement overtakes one, he should think of anything and everthing else than his own troubles, and more than this, he should take measures at once to follow new currents of thought and feeling. Sometimes the mood is purely the result of bodily conditions, and requires for its cure sleep or exercise in the open air, or change of diet, or a simple waiting till it passes away of itself. When it springs from causes not connected with the body, then the cure must be spiritual or intellectual. An intensely interesting novel, visitation among the poor, constant intercourse with fresh minds, change of scene, travel, the study of a science new to the patient, anything that will absorb the brain and keep it from consuming itself is good medicine.

The world is full of sunshine and beauty. "It is right, meet, and our bounden duty" that we should open our hearts to all the soothing, healing, invigorating influences of the sky that bends over us in unchanging love, the balmy air, the happy chirp of innumerable insects, the ten thousand voices with which nature speaks to him whose ears are opened to receive her gentle teachings.—*N. The Chinese New Year.

The Chinese celebrate their New Year on the 15th of Febuary. It is with them a day of feasting, their superlative enjoyment. A San Francisco paper thus describes the anniversary as celebrated last season: The beginning of the Chinese New Year is slightly eccentric, and always takes place between the last quarter and the new moon. It is a season of general rejoicing in the Quarter, and yesterday proved no exception to the rule. At midnight every joss-house presented a scene of brilliancy and Mongolian splendor only attained by the tinsel-loving Chinese. Bombs and crackers were exploded at intervals, and the tympanum-eradicating tom-tom rendered the early morning exceedingly hideous. Magnificent attired Celestials perambulated the streets, entered the houses of their friends, and after performing the customary salaams, partook of the greasy-looking dainties piled upon the sideboards, and then called the proprietor aside, inquired whether it would not be convenient for him to settle that little account that had been so long outstanding against him. Having performed this duty, and in most instances having obtained the "little account," more oleaginous viands were partaken of, more salaams perpetrated, and the gaudily attired exiles of Far Cathay majestically strode from within the limits of their hospitable entertainers. A hundred lights flashed from within doorways shielded from the passing gaze by their bright-colored curtains, from behind which came the sound of dice clinking in porcelain or chinaware bowls. The inmates were indulging their passion for gambling to a greater extent than usual, feeling safe from arrest on account of its being "Allee same New Year, you sabe?" And over all, from every hovel and temple, out of the alleys and cul-de-sacs, arose the foul odor of strange and barbarous incense to the various gods, goddesses and josses which the worshipers wished to propitiate during the years.

The festival will last several days, and San Francisco may depend upon experiencing the usual "annual nuisance," although the police have placed some restrictions upon the firing of bombs and crackers by these din-loving people. The temples and restaurants will present the most curious features to visitors, and those who can should not fail to view them upon at least one day or evening. Lanterns adorn the balconies of these places, and richly hung chandeliers throw a blaze of radiance upon the richly plated gewgaws and fantastically arranged figures, as well as the central figures of interest—the josses. The only discomfort that will be experienced will be from the heavy fusilades of crackers and bombs that will be discharged in every direction to warn off evil spirits. Those who slept last night in the vicinity of Chinese Quarter are full aware that the Chinese New Year has opened, and it only remains to state that they have entered upon the eight thousand six hundred and fifty-first year of the world.

Joe Black.

The first time I ever saw Joe Black he was out on the sidewalk in front of the house where he lived. It was a sharp winter morning. He had a coat on, but no hat. A boy who goes out of a winter morning without any hat on will be almost sure to catch cold, get a sore throat, and perhaps have the croup and be very sick indeed.

There are a number of boys out on the sidewalk too, and Joe was looking on to see them play, rather than playing with them. Some of them were sliding along on the ice in the gutter, others were snowballing, and all seemed to be having a fine time.

Pretty soon a man came along. Joe was busy watching the boys, and did not see or hear the man until he was close upon him. The man had a heavy bundle upon his shoulder, and called out rather angrily to Joe: "Get out of the way."

Joe was not a little frightened at the harsh tone in which the man spoke to him, and got out of the way as quickly as he could. Some boys would have answered this rude man rudely back, and perhaps told him to get out of the way himself; but Joe took the roughness very meekly. The next morning Joe was out again; only this time he had not got as far as the sidewalk, but was standing on the doorsteps, looking up and down the street and wondering what he should do. While he was so standing and wondering, the same man came along who had spoken so unkindly to him the day before. He had what looked like the same bundle on his shoulder. The man did not see Joe, but Joe saw him and recognized him. But he kept perfectly still and watched him go by.

Presently the man, as he walked along, put his hand in his side pocket and pulled out his handkerchief. In so doing, he pulled out one of his mittens too. It fell unseen by its owner upon the sidewalk. When he put his handkerchief back in his pocket he did not miss the mitten. There it lay, just where it fell, and the man walking faster and faster away.

Some boys in Joe's place would have been glad that such a cross man had lost his mitten and would hope that he might never find it. Not so Joe Black. He saw what had happened—the handkerchief taken out, the mitten fallen and left lying on the walk, the man unconscious even that he had dropped it. It took him but a moment to decide that he ought to go and restore the mitten to its owner. I don't know that he so much as thought of the cross way the man had spoken to him the day before. If he did, he did not cherish any resentment. So off he started down the steps and along the walk until he came to the mitten. Picking it up he ran on after the man as fast as his legs could carry him. Instead of calling out to him, he waited until he got close behind him, and then gently touched his hand. The man turned round to see who had touched him. There stood Joe, holding up the mitten.

"Well done!" said the man, recognizing the mitten and feeling in his pocket at the same moment. "Well done! where did you find that?" And he took the mitten and put it back in his pocket.

Joe only wagged his tail; for he was nothing but a great Newfoundland dog, Joe Black, and he couldn't speak a work. But I have sometimes thought that he was more of a gentleman than the man who dropped his mitten. At any rate, he knew how to return good for evil.—Independent.

A Child's Faith.—A correspondent of the New York Evangelist relates the following instance of a child's faith: Last year, coming from Pittsburgh east in a sleeping car, my apartment was next to that occupied by a gentleman, his wife, and their little daughter, perhaps four years old. The lady was excessively timid—not to put too fine a point upon it, terribly nervous. The Horseshoe Curve seemed to be her especial terror, and my sleep, and I presume that of others, was disturbed by her talking to her husband of the peril. The engineer might be asleep, or the switch-tender might be asleep, and the train would certainly be plunged down the abyss. But it was worth while to be awake, when I heard the sweet rebuke, not intended, but real, of the little one: "Ma, God takes care of us, and does God sleep?" Was not this the ordaining strength out of the mouth of babes? Happy for the mother if it proved strength to her faith!

Religious Intelligence.

—The suppression of the order of the Sisters of Charity has been decreed by the Mexican Congress by a vote of 113 against 57.

—There are five Congregational churches in San Francisco, in four of which the membership is about 900. All the churches sustain Chinese Sunday-schools.

—The Presbyterian Theological Seminary in Chicago has about twenty students; the Congregational, has forty-one; the Baptist, about fifty.

—The First Colored Presbyterian Church of Memphis, Tenn., has been organized, and consists of seventeen members, two elders and two deacons.

—Pres. Wallace, of Monmouth, has had a call to the United Presbyterian church in St, Louis. It is not likely he will leave his present important position.

—The semi centennial anniversary of the American Tract Society has just been held in New York. The annual report showed that the annual issues for fifty years have averaged more than 10,000,000 publications, more than half a million of these being volumes.

—W. C. Van Meter writes from Rome that his work is flourishing. He sends a circular setting forth October efforts and results. The schools are generally prosperous; five hundred and sixty one pupils are reported in the several schools.

—It is estimated that over 400 souls were converted during Mr. Hammond's revival work at Nashua, N. H., and the work continues, though he has gone West. After leaving Galesburg, Ill., he goes to California. Were it not for his Pacific coast engagements, he would respond favorably to calls from Chicago and Washington, D. C.

—The Telescope says of the United Brethren in Christ: "Our people are neither trembling nor ashamed before the face of Jefferson Davis, Albert G. Pike, nor King Alcohol, representative chiefs of principles to which with Heaven's approval we shall forever stand opposed."

—The Woman's Temperance Union has appointed the observance of Monday, Jan. 4th, as a day of fasting and prayer for the overthrow of intemperance. This is in connection with the appointment for the week of prayer, which recommends that the prayers of the day be for the putting away of national sins.

—The position of the Friends on a salaried ministry is thus briefly explained in The Journal. The Friends do not oppose an intelligent ministry. "They do oppose the principle of having a set of men trained at college expressly for preachers, who, after acquiring a certain amount of 'book learning,' put their talent into the market, perhaps selling to the highest bidder. It was this abuse, and the oppression of the church of England, that induced George Fox to declare that it was neither at Cambridge or Oxford that ministers were qualified." A trained and paid ministry is opposed as a fundimental evil.

—The Chicago Tribune on the arrival of E. P. Hammond in Galesburg, Ill., republished a villianous attack upon him by a Universalist preacher and a low-lived sheet published in that city. Rev. M. L. Williston, pastor of the Congregational church in that city, has taken the Tribune in hand and exploded all the vicious stories to which it lent its columns. He testifies of Mr. Hammond's usefulness thus: "The great majority of the religious people here feel that incalculable good has been done through Mr. Hammond's instrumentality allied to the Christian co-operation of the churches; and the end is not yet. We believe that the revival of righteousness now in progress among us will continue; new proofs of an extension of its good effects are apparent every day. We are persuaded that hundreds have taken sides with God and will live nobler lives for it." The pastors of the city also united in the following testimonial: "For the past three weeks, the Rev. E. P. Hammond has labored as an Evangelist in Galesburg, holding two or three meetings daily. We, the undersigned, ministers in this city, having noted his methods of work, and having joined in his services, do cheerfully commend him to the brotherhood of ministers and earnest Christian workers, wherever he may go."

Farm and Garden.

CHARCOAL FOR SICK CATTLE.—Nearly all animals become sick from improper eating. In nine cases out of ten the digestion is wrong. Charcoal is the most efficient and rapid corrective. It will cure in a majority of cases if properly administered. An example of its use: The hired man came in with the intelligence that one of the finest cows was very sick, and a kind neighbor proposed the usual drugs and poisons. The owner being ill, and unable to examine the cow, concluded that the trouble came from some over-eating, and ordered a teacup of pulverized charcoal given in water. It was mixed, placed in a junk bottle, the head held upwards and the water, with its charcoal, poured downwards. In five minutes an improvement was visible, and in a few hours the animal was in the pasture quietly eating grass. Another instance of equal success occurred with a young heifer which became badly bloated by eating green apples after a hard wind. The bloat was so severe that the sides were almost as hard as a barrel. The old remedy, saleratus, was tried for the purpose of correcting the acidity; but the attempt to put down always caused coughing, and it did little good. Half a teacupful of fresh-powdered charcoal was next given. In six hours all appearance of bloat had gone, and the heifer was well.—Country Gentleman.

FEEDING STRAW AND ROOTS.—The North British Agriculturist, in reply to a correspondent, thus describes the proper method of feeding straw and roots together: The straw should be cut one and one-half inches long, and a heaped teaspoonful of salt mixed to each beast per day. The mixing process should be accomplished the day before the stuff is to be used, and water must be within the animal's reach. Hay for horses should be cut about three-quarters of an inch long, and put into deep boxes before the animals. We prefer giving bruised oats and a good fresh Swiss turnip or two daily, separate from the cut hay. Rather less than an ounce of salt daily is plenty for a horse. They should get an ounce of niter every Saturday night. As to the question of pulping and straw cutting paying, a good deal will depend on the power available. If water power can be obtained so much the better; but if animal or steam power is employed, the expense of the system will be increased. We should be surprised to find that our correspondent can keep nearly one-fourth more of cattle on his farm by means of pulping or straw cutting. If the animals get what they can eat they will consume more turnips pulped with safety than in any other way. The great advantages of pulping are that there is no choking or blowing; that feeders are enabled to have turnips, though in a mixed state, continually before cattle, and that cattle will consume more roots, and, we think, take on fat and flesh rather quicker than with any other system of feeding. Deeper troughs will be required with pulped roots and cut straw than for the ordinary system practiced in the district in which our correspondent farms. We would not advise the addition of cake to the mixture, as it is, we think, too costly to be mixed up in such a heap, and is more satisfactorily given by itself. It is a decided improvement, as preventing waste, to cut the hay given to horses; and yet more desirable is it to bruise the oats, but we would give the hay and oats separate.

To Free Fowls from Lice—It is not necessary to kill fowls to get rid of the lice. Clean out the house and whitewash it thoroughly. Grease the roosting-poles with a mixture of lard and kerosene oil, and renew it as it is worn off. The lice will soon disappear. A little of the grease rubbed beneath the wings of the fowls will also add to its effect.

Screw-Driving.—Very often a screw hole gets so worn that the screw will not stay in. Where glue is handy, the regular carpenter makes the holes larger and glues in a large plug, making a nest for an entire new hole. But this is not always the case, and people without tools, and in an emergency, often have to fix the thing at once. Generally leather is used, but this is so hard that it does not hold well. The best of all things is to cut narrow strips of cork, and fill the hole completely. Then force the screw in. This will make as tight a job as if driven into an entirely new hole.

Home and Health Hints.

What I know of Housekeeping.—A lady correspondent of the Maine Farmer gives the following valuable hints to housekeepers: "If you wish short biscuit without much shortening, do not knead them. Do your husband's and brother's boots let water through them? Then apply tar and oil, after being thoroughly mixed, and you will have no further trouble. Patent not applied for. One cup of sugar, one of buttermilk, one egg, one-fourth of a nutmeg, one and one-half tea spoonfuls of saleratus, three table-spoonfuls of melted lard, will make just as good doughnuts as any editor ought to eat. Some cooks are invariably troubled with 'saleratus biscuits.' But allowing just one even tea-spoonful of saleratus the trouble will be obviated. If brimstone is offensive, use strips of paper one inch wide, rolled into a lengthy cylinder, for lighters. If you wish to save your papers, a bit of split pine will answer better, and when stacked in a lava vase, make a very conspicuous ornament."

Scald flannel before making, as it shrinks in the first washing. This shrinking is usually caused by using too much soap and washing them in too cold water. Never use soda for flannels.

How to Iron Pants, Coats, etc.—Pants can be made to look very nicely after washing them, by brushing clear from all particles of lint, turn wrong side out, press all the seams with a hot flat over a press-board, turn back to the right side, wet a piece of white muslin in clear water, rinsing out, spread over a portion of the pants (which have previously been folded smoothly), laid over the muslin until completely dry, remove, wet again, put over a new place and iron again; do this until the whole surface has been gone over.

Temperance.

What Shall I do?

Mr. F. K. Phœnix, of the Bloomington Nurseries, Ill., thus answers the above question in behalf of the temperance reform. If all Christian churches had the zeal and earnestness of Mr. Phœnix against the social evils of the world, things would soon be better:

Before God's altar you must forever do your best and your worst. There, far more than in your closet, do you span, include, reveal all life before God and the universe. There, every time you meet you do openly confess Christ or anti-Christ, temperance or intemperance, prohibition or whisky, as in this supreme issue and crisis, your lord and master. Before that issue you and yours cannot escape the responsibility fresh down from God above, heavier and heavier every breath you breathe, every meeting you attend, every soul you meet, every dollar you pay out.

God's divine Christ-reforms are constantly sent from above to try us and our human professions and organizations—whether they will serve God or devil. Eight years' careful observation make me hopeless of present organizations; there is (to me) too much dead wood in them. They fill all high places with red-handed whisky-licensers, robbers of weak men, women and children. Of every seven dollars we earn, they make us give four to the devil.

Do to others as you would have others do to you. Were you that starving, rum-bedeviled, tobacco-robbed wife, mother, child, what would you want your rich, pious, powerful, professed temperance friends all over America to do first for you? Meet and part, part and meet for gas and windwork; to say temperance, and then work and pay straight out for all intemperance? In every rum-tobacco-trail, corset-robbed soul and home God asks you, and this whole nation that question and holds you to its speedy, rightful answer or to the consequences of your present wilful neglect of it.

A Temperance Fact.

"I don't like that red nose, and those blear eyes, and that stupid, downcast look. You are a drunkard. Another pint, and one pint more; a glass of gin and water, rum and milk, cider and pepper, a glass of peppermint, and all the beastly fluids which drunkards pour down their throats. It is very possible to conquer it if you will but be resolute. I remember a man in Staffordshire who was drunk every day of his life. Every farthing he earned went to the alehouse. One evening he staggered home, and found at a late hour his wife sitting alone, and drowned in tears. He was a man not deficient in natural affections; he appeared to be struck with the wretchedness of the woman, and with some eagerness asked her why she was crying. "I don't like to tell you, James," she said, "but if I must, I must; the truth is, my children have not touched a morsel of anything this blessed day. As for me, never mind me; I must leave you to guess how it has fared with me. But not one morsel of food could I beg or buy for those children that lie on that bed before you; and I am sure, James, it is better for us all we should die, and to my soul I wish we were dead." "Dead!" said James, starting up as if a flash of lightning had darted upon him; "dead, Sally! You, and Mary, and the two young ones dead? Look at me, lass; you see what I am now—like a brute. I have wasted your substance—the curse of God is upon me—I am drawing near to the pit of destruction—but there's an end; I feel there's an end. Give me that glass, wife." She gave it him with astonishment and fear. He turned it topsy-turvy; and striking the table with great violence, and flinging himself on his knees, made a most solemn and affecting vow to God of repentance and sobriety. From that moment to the day of his death he drank no fermented liquor, but confined himself entirely to tea and water. I never saw so sudden and astonishing a change. His looks became healthy, his cottage neat, his children were clad, his wife was happy; and twenty times the poor man and his wife, with tears in their eyes, have told me the story, and blessed the evening of the fourteenth of March, the day of James's restoration, and have shown me the glass he held in his hand when he made the vow of sobriety. It is all nonsense about not being able to work without ale, and gin, and cider, and fermented liquors. Do lions and cart-horses drink ale? It is mere habit. If you have good, nourishing food, you can do very well without ale. Nobody works harder than the Yorkshire people, and for years together there are many Yorkshire laborers who never taste ale."—Sidney Smith.

Our Gin Shops.

Go if you please into one of your drinking rooms, one of your gin shops, one of your public houses; see men standing at the counter; look at that pale-faced, pallid-looking gin drinker; see the eyes large and sunk deep in the sockets, as with his fingers, like the claws of an unclean bird, he clutches that glass of gin. Why, he looks almost as if he had come up out of his grave to get his gin, and had forgotten the way back again. It is horrible to look at him. And yet that is a man! See that other standing; the dull waters of disease stagnant in his eye—sensuality seated upon his cracked, swollen, parched lip; see him gibbering in all the idiocy of drunkenness. That is a man!

"That is a man."

I know it is sometimes hard to look at the blear-eyed, bloated sot, and feel, "That is a man." God created him with the same faculties; God made him upright—in the image of God created he him; he gave him dominion over the beasts of the field, and crowned him lord of creation. That a man—a blear-eyed, blotted thing like that! A man? What has brought him to that? Has he come to this position willingly and of his own accord? He has come to it by the deceptive influences of drink—by coming to false conclusions, and using false arguments.

I am not such a fool.

When I ask men, young men especially, who are commencing life, why it is they drink, they may ask me why I put the question? But if I say to you: "I am afraid that if you drink you will become a drunkard," what will you say to me? You will say "I am not such a fool as to become a drunkard; I have got a mind of my own;" as if every man who became a drunkard was a fool, and had no mind of his own! "I can leave it off when I have a mind to," just as if the man who became a drunkard never could leave it off when he had a mind to!

"I have a will of my own."

"I have got a will of my own," just as if God never gave the drunkard a will! Was there ever a drunkard who did not think he had "a will of his own;" and was there ever a drunkard who did not feel sure he would not be "such a fool?"—Christian at Work.

A Home Question.—An old western farmer, about the time that the temperance reform was beginning to exert a heathful influence in the country, said to his man-servant, "Jonathan, I did not think to say that I think of trying to do my work this year without rum. How much more must I give you to do without it?" "Oh, I don't care much about it," replied Jonathan; "you may give me what you please." "Well," said the farmer, "I will give you a sheep every autumn if you will do without." "Agreed," responded Jonathan. The eldest son said, "Father, will you give me a sheep too, if I will do without rum?" "Yes, Marshall, you shall have a sheep if you will do without." The younger son, a stripling, then said, "Father, will you give me a sheep if I will do without?" "Yes, Chandler, you shall have a sheep also if you will do without." Presently Chandler spoke again. "Father, hadn't you better take a sheep too?"

Facts and Figures.

—A statistician has found that the salaries of twenty-eight prelates of the established church of England amount to $800,000, but to this you must add $200,000 for as many deans. The annual patronage attached to these twenty-eight dioceses is valued at $4,500,000. This patronage includes canons resident, archdeacons, and other clerical snuggeries. The value of the real estate of the established church of England may be estimated from its revenue, which, at its lowest rate, is $35,000,000 annually.

—A quarter-inch rod of the best steel will sustain 9,000 pounds before breaking; soft steel, 7,000 pounds; iron wire, 9,000; iron, 4,000; inferior bar iron, 2,000; cast iron 1,000 to 3,000; copper wire, 3,000; silver 2,000; gold, 2,500; tin, 3,000; cast zinc, 160; cast lead, 50; milled lead 200. Of wood, box and locust the same size will hold 1,200 pounds; toughest ash, 1,000; elm, 800; beech, cedar, white oak, pitch pine, 600; chestnut and maple, 650; poplar, 400. Wood which will bear a heavy weight for a minute or two will break with two-thirds of the force acting along time. A rod of iron is about ten times as strong as hemp cord. A rope, an inch in diameter, will bear about two and a half tons; but in practice it is not safe to subject it to a strain of more than about a ton. Half an inch in diameter the strength will be one quarter as much; a quarter of an inch, one-sixteenth as much, and so on.

—The great Salt Lake valley was settled in 1847. The level of the lake is now twelve or fifteen feet higher then it was then. From 1841 to 1852 there was no noticable change. From 1853 to 1856 there was a rise to the extent of about six feet above the lowest level of the first mentioned year. From 1856 to 1861, a gradual subsidence took place, until the fall of 1861, the level was two feet below the lowest mark of 1852, and the lake was contracted to about three-fourths of its area in that year. But from the spring of 1861 to 1868 there went on a steady rise; the lake extended to once and a half its area in 1861, and its surface stood twelve feet above the earlier level. Since that time the rise and fall have been about equal, the tendency being on the whole to gain, fluctuations not exceeding two feet. As to the prospect for the future, it is stated that the humidity of the atmosphere annually increases as the area of cultivation becomes greater, and, as a consequence, the evaporation becomes less. On the other hand, the mountain streams are steadily enlarging. Thousands of acres of farming, meadow and pasture lands have been submerged along the eastern and northern shores of the lake, and many square miles of valuable lands still occupied by the farmers will be completely inundated should the water rise but a few inches above the level of the past five years, unless protected by levees. A monument has been recently placed near the shore of the lake to indicate the fluctuations of its level. This will be watched with great interest for the next few years.

—The increase in the cost of coal and in wages in England during the last year has had a visible effect on the dividends of the great English railway companies. The gross receipts have been increased, but the expenses have also increased and in a greater proportion. On the London and Northwestern railway the working expenses have risen from fifty-three to fifty-six per cent of the gross receipts, and the dividend has consequently been reduced from 7 to 6½ per cent., notwithstanding an increase of more than three-quarters of a million dollars in gross receipts.

—Printing a book in China is done as follows: Two pages are written, by one trained to the business, on a sheet of thin paper, divided into columns by black lines, and in the space between the two pages are written the title of the work and the number of chapter and page. When the sheet has been printed it is folded down through this space, so as to bring the title, etc., partly on each page. The sheet, when ready for printing, is pasted face downward, on a smooth block of wood, made usually from the pear or plum tree. As soon as it is dry, the paper is rubbed off with great care, leaving behind an inverted impression of the characters. Another workman now cuts away the blank spaces by means of a sharp graver, and the block, with the characters in high relief, passes to the printer, who performs his work by hand. The two points he has to be most careful about are to ink the characters equally with his brush, and to avoid tearing the paper when taking the impression. From a good wooden block some 15,000 copies may be printed, and when the characters have been sharpened up a little, it is possible to obtain 8,000 or 10,000 more impressions.

—The New England Farmer inquires whether the study of the classics does not tend to give ignoble ideas regarding the pursuit of agriculture, inasmuch as the laborer was a helot or slave; while the pursuits and occupations to which the greatest praise was given related to war and acts of injustice. It may be true that the classics have an unfavorable influence on the minds of the young, for the reason that so little is applicable to present times. But this is far from being true with reference to the application of the classics to agriculture, for no more elegant writing on all that relates to the rural industries can be found than in the works of Virgil. Nor can a young man with an imaginative cultivated mind find so much to make the life of a farmer cheering in all modern literature as he can find in the Georgics and Bucolics. Indeed, we would say that the best foundation for agricultural literature in these days, that is if it is to be made attractive, is in Virgil.—Tribune.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issued by him, purporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abdnction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationalist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The author belongcd to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughout the country forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is supposed by many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acquainted with Mr. Greene. and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y.,, and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—'The Storm Gathering;" "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

Topics of the Time.

THE SOUTHERN LASH.—At a so-called Farmer's convention in Atlanta, Ga., the other day, the labor question at the South was elucidated by the following facts. One speaker argued that the negro became worthless as soon as he became free, therefore the North in years past sent all negroes to the slave States but the Swedes were ten times worse than the negro. The reason is left to surmise, which is not far from right in saying that the Swedes will not brook abuse or cheating with equal grace. Another wanted the negroes exiled and the land populated in a rapid and Mormon fashion. Another said that he had whipped several of his negroes lately, and always made them promise not to prosecute him while the chastisement was going on. In this way he kept his negroes under perfect control. The spots on the sun of Southern prosperity are growing thicker and larger. The horrid passions of war and lust for traffic in bodies and souls of men are only caged. If unchecked their fury may soon blossom and bear fruit of blood.

IS IT A BRIBE?—Not long since the pope sent a solid silver medal, of exquisite workmanship and bearing his profile, to the Messrs. Appleton & Co., of New York, as a token of his admiration for their fine publication, "Picturesque America." The revised edition of Messrs. Appleton's American Encyclopedia has been severely criticized for mutilation of history in articles on the Romish Church. Now by the simple addition of these facts there appears a problem of another kind: Is the Pope putting silver medals where they will do the most good, or is his satisfaction over this fine specimen of the printer's art so overcoming?

THE SPANISH SUBSTITUTION.—It is called revolution, but it is not—nothing but taking away one figurehead and setting up another. In all the changes since the abdication of the prostitute Isabella, the provisional government of Prim, the limited monarchy of Amadeo, the republic of Castelar and Serrano, the people of Spain have all along been the same frivolous, ignorant and superstitious mass, faithless in their allegiance to either By what means young Prince Alphonso has been restored to the throne of his mother it does not yet appear; but Serrano, the President, was a well known Alphonsist sympathizer and the coup-d'etat that unseated Castelar was enough. It ended the republic, and a second stroke was needless. The experience of Spain is another proof that "corrupt freemen are the worst of slaves." Self-government is a farce, which may become a tragedy, with any people who are already bound by superstition and brutal ignorance. Spain with her priest and bull-fight could only experiment with the system: she found it an edged tool apt to cut the unskilful hand.

NEW YEARS FOR THE POPE.—Since the reign of Charles X., no Romish prelate has been so honored as was the Catholic Archbishop of Paris on New Year's Day in assisting at McMahon's reception. This significant honor, added to the Ultramontane acquisition of a king in Spain, will cheer Pope Pius after his trouble with German and English Protestants. Alphonso has sent for a blessing to Rome, and the President of France leans upon the Catholic leader of France. These facts bode no good to Republicanism in Europe.

WILL IT NEVER STOP!—When the Credit Mobilier, with its far-reaching arms swept down a score of our public men a year since, everybody said, Enough of this! The country is sick of wrecked confidences. But, like a ruthless coroner, Congress still unearths the putrifying corpses of broken faith. The District investigation and "safe-burglary" case are not yet reinterred, when we have the Pacific Mail subsidy with $750,000 spent in the lobby of Congress. King, representative elect from Minnesota and postmaster of the House, is found to be one of the distributing agents, and now Schumaker, Democratic Representative from New York, has over $200,000 traced to his account. The bottom of this sink of iniquity is not yet reached. How many more characters are to be fished out we do not know, and for charity's sake hope there are none. But true charity is strict justice in this case and every other of the kind. So let justice be done, whatever falls, even congressional politicians.

Letter of Albert Barnes.

PHILADELPHIA, July 20, 1849.

GENTLEMEN:—I have never belonged to an secret society—Freemason, Oddfellow, Sons of Temperance, or any other,—and with my present views, I never shall. Any good cause, I think, can be promoted openly; any secret association, is liable at least, to abuse and danger.

I am respectfully yours,

ALBERT BARNES.

Reminiscences of Oren Cravath.

The recent death of that Christian philanthropist, Oren Cravath has called to the mind of the writer many pleasant reminiscenses of his old friend and fellow-laborer in the cause of anti-slavery; and he narrates a few of them, believing that they will not be without interest to other friends of the deceased, and useful to general readers. In a recent letter from the venerable Gerrit Smith, he wrote "Dear Oren Cravath! I knew him well, and honored his faithfulness."

The year 1835 was distinguished for pro-slavery mobs, and disturbances of for anti-slavery meetings, especially the mobs in Charleston, S. C., Utica, N. Y., and Boston, Mass. These tumults and disturbances elicited the attention of the subject of these reminiscenses, and induced him carefully to investigate the principles and the measures at issue between the Abolitionists at that time their opponents; for shortly after he called on the writer, self-moved and unexpectedly, and said he had been thinking that he ought to do something to aid the Abolitionists in their work, and wished to be advised in what direction he could contribute most effectively. This contribution was liberal one, and was followed by similar ones. He was then an extensive farmer in Homer, N. Y. To increase his knowledge of the practical working of the system of slavery, he subscribed for the Charleston, (S. C.) Courier, and from its editorials, advertisements, etc., he derived much information, which he subsequently used with good effect. His views of the great work to be done by Abolitionists, and the numerous, immediate and remote obstacles to the progress of their cause, were comprehensive and well considered; and the appropriate means to be used in his own town and county were carefully devised. Occasionally, when it seemed to him necessary, he wrote articles for anti-slavery papers. These were noticable for good sense, and adaptedness to the circumstances of the times. Few, if any, of his fellow-laborers were so wont to attend anti-slavery conventions and meetings as he, and in aiding or making provision for others to attend perhaps he was without an equal. In accomplishing the organization of the Liberty party in Cortland county, he was one of the most efficient actors, and labored to augment its numbers, influence, and keep it intact from adverse influences. More than seven-eights of the new party came from the Whig party; and the Democrats, meantime, were quite anxious that those should be true to their principles, and faithful to their party obligations; and the Whigs were no less anxious and determined to prevent, if possible, others from joining them, and used means accordingly. The consequent excitement and clamor did not at all deter him, and he volunteered his services, with horse, and buggy, to a friend, and accompanied him to other parts of the country to attend meetings, and accessions were thereby gained to the party.

In 1847, J. P. Hale was nominated by the Liberty Party Convention at Buffalo, as a candidate for the President of the United States. Mr. Cravath supported him until he withdrew, and Messrs. Van Buren, for President, and C. F. Adams, for Vice-president, were nominated by the convention at Buffalo the ensuing year, composed of members of the Liberal party, and seceders from the Democratic and Whig parties, in consideration of the position of their respective parties in regard to slavery. Mr. C. was a delegate to this convention and supported those candidates, although not well pleased with Mr. Van Buren, deeming it important in view of the changes which had occurred, to combine all opponents to slavery for united action against the policy of the Democratic administration to "diffuse" and perpetuate "the peculiar institutions of the South." By this action he differed from a few of his immediate fellow-laborers, but none entertained the thought that his interest was diminished in the cause he had done so much to promote.

Several fugitives escaping from slavery, passed through Homer on their way to Canada, and some them called on Mr. Cravath, and were entertained by him, and one or two continued for a time and worked for wages. An amusing incident occurred in connection with one of them, whom he suspected as not having been a slave. Desirous of being satisfied, he was watchful for an opportunity to apply a satisfactory test to him. Sam was at work in Mr. C's clover-mill and while using a fork, it would seem carelessly, it was caught in a machine, and some damage was done. Being present,

Mr. C. endeavored to imitate the manner of an overseer of slaves, and succeeded far enough to make an impression upon Sam who was immediately on his knees, begging pardon and promised to be careful in the future. Mr. C. was satisfied that Sam had been slave.

At one time some six or eight fugitives from slavery in a covered wagon, guided by a free colored man, knowing where to stop, called on Mr. Cravath, early Sunday morning and were entertained by him. These seekers for liberty were most of them recently from bondage, being alarmed in view of slave dealers and slave hunters, prowling about the large village in the Southern part of the State in which they had resided for some time. The writer being privately informed where they were stopping, called on them, and was present at their supper which was bountifully prepared for them by Mrs. Cravath. They manifested much gratitude to their benefactors for their entertainment and in the evening went forward on the way to Canada, hopeful and rejoicing.

As a neighbor, Mr. Cravath was uniformly kind and obliging. In closing their memorial sketches, it may be mentioned with propriety that his style of living was plain and decent, believing that conformity to the world in costly array and superfluities was a misuse of means, which could be used for benevolent purposes and much good be done thereby. S S. BRADFORD.

College Secret Societies.

From having been the nurseries of secret societies, our colleges are becoming surfeited with their fruits. Choice specimens of these, gathered from the fertile nurseries of Cornell, Bates, Michigan and other universities, have recently been served up, with benefitting condiments, by the Cynosure for public entertainment.

I do not propose to give a re-hash of them; but to offer a few remarks on the responsibility of college officials.

1. By the authority invested in them, as the deputed agents of a public trust, they have the power to suppress and abolish secret societies within their jurisdiction, as insuperable barriers to the due execution of that trust.

They have no satisfactory excuse for not doing it. Do they plead that it might render them unpopular with the disbanded members, and enkindle in them a spirit of revolt, culminating perhaps in the exodus of more or less to other colleges! This plea, like that once urged against the abolition of slavery, is based on the fear of consequences. It savors too of that ignoble spirit of selfishness, which riots in their secret conclaves, and through its demoralizing influence, holds in obeyance the laws of college.

As it is through the default of their officials that our colleges are infested with such societies, they are responsible for their continuance, and for all the evils that result from them.

Hence the people, their constituents, from whom they receive their charters, their resources, and their pupils, have a right to demand and do demand of them, the immediate suppression and utter extermination of said societies, which as above stated, are insuperable barriers to the execution of the vitally important trust committed to them. Decision of Chief Justice Daly on the Sunday Law.

[Given in December, 1874.]

In the case of Adolph Neuendorf against Abram Duryee and others, the Police Commissioners, in which the question of the constitutionality of the Sunday law was at issue, Chief Justice Daly, of the Court of Common Pleas, has rendered a decision against the legality of Sunday theatrical performances, and in favor of the constitutionality of the law under which the Police Commissioners claim they are prohibited. The Judge's opinion is as follows:

It is claimed that the act is unconstitutional, because it is a local act, and the subject of it is not, as the constitution requires, expressed in its title. It is entitled "An act to preserve the public peace and order on the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday," and the subject of it is the prohibition of public theatrical performances on that day in the city of New York. A statute designed to preserve the public peace and order upon a Sunday, need not, in its title, express what is prohibited in the act, with a view to that end; for if that was so, everything prohibited would have to appear in or be expressed by the title, which would be absurd. It is sufficient if what is forbidden to be done comes within the general purpose expressed by the title —the preservation of public peace and order; and, considering this to be the rule of interpretation, how can this court declare judicially that the prohibition of public theatrical performances in this city on Sunday does not and cannot in any way conduce to the preservation of peace and order upon that day.

It is argued that in the majority of Christian countries, public theatrical performances are permitted upon Sunday; to which I may add that in many or most of those countries, after a certain hour, shops are also allowed to be opened, and all servile employments carried on, the same as upon any other day of the week. In nearly all of the States of this Union, however, as well as in the country from which our institutions are derived, no such practice exists; for Sunday is regarded not alone as a day of religious observance, but also as a day of rest.

"It is a mistake," says Bishop, "to suppose that Sabbath keeping is a thing merely of religious observance, or especially a tenet of some particular sect;" on the contrary, he remarks, "the setting apart by the whole community of one day in seven, wherein the thoughts of men and the physical activities shall be turned into other than their accustomed channels, is a thing pertaining as much to the law of nature as is the intervening of the nights between the days." (Bishop on Criminal law, vol. i. section 946, n. 5, 4th ed.)

We have statutes in this State forbidding any servile laboring, or working on that day, excepting works of necessity or charity, unless done by those who keep Saturday as their Sabbath; forbidding the sale of goods, wares, or merchandise, and forbidding many things from being done which would otherwise be harmless, such as shooting, hunting, fishing, etc.; (1. Revised Statutes, pp. 675, 676,) and like statutes exist in other States and in Great Britain. By long established usage, moreover, in this country and Great Britain, the theaters have been closed upon Sundays, a custom existing so long and so universally observed as to dispense with the necessity of statutory enactments, until one or more theatrical proprietors in this city undertook to disregard it some few years ago, which led to the enactment of the statute in question.

The quiet and order upon that day incident to the shutting up of all places of public amusement, the absence of all traffic, and the cessation from ordinary work and labor, are in marked contrast with the mingled pursuit of business and pleasure on Sunday in many of the cities in continental Europe. In those cities, when the morning religious service is over in the churches, all parties are free to work, labor, traffic, or amuse themselves as they think proper; but in our cities the great bulk of the community attend public worship not only in the morning, but in the afternoon, or else in the evening; so that by a very large class the day is observed throughout as a day of religious occupation and duty, while to all it is a day of rest from their ordinary employments, and if they make it so, of quiet and repose.

It is this well-known feature which gives to the Sunday with us a characteristic element of order, sufficiently distinguished and understood to indicate generally what is meant by the preservation of order on Sunday, as expressed in the title to this act. Previous laws have forbidden all work and labor on that day except works of necessity and charity; but if the theaters are opened for the giving of public performances, the actors and all employed in giving them violate the statutes forbidding work and labor on Sunday, and an element of order, which it was the design of these statutes to maintain, is disturbed.

There is, therefore, a feature of order which is preserved by keeping the theaters closed upon Sunday, and that being the object of the act, it is expressed by the title. The objection that the title does not express that the act is limited to the city of New York is not well taken. All that the Constitution requires is that if the act be a local act, the subject of it be expressed in its title. The subject of the act is distinguishable from its local operation, and it is the fact of its local operation, ascertained by inspecting the body of the act, which renders it void, if the provision of the Constitution has not been complied with. Judgment must, therefore, be rendered for the defendant.

Willie Lyon's Great Trouble.

From the Chicago Standard (Baptist) Dec. 17, 1874.

Willie Lyon was the only son of a widowed mother. Mrs. Lyon was left with a competency, and she desired to use it in educating her boy for a life of usefulness. In the village of B——, where she lived, was an academy, renowned for its high standard of instruction and thoroughness in preparing students for college. In this academy Willie was a bright, active and intelligent student, and, owing to his kindness of heart, and willingness to give up his own wishes to the wishes of others, he was a general favorite with both teachers and scholars.

When Willie was sixteen years of age, there was a new arrival of boys, gentlemen's sons from the city, who brought with them bad habits, which were to have a deleterious influence on the minds of other students. Willie soon became a favorite with the new-comers, winning them by his kindness and pleasing manners, and they winning him by making him their confidant, and by their seeming superior knowledge of the world.

It was not long before the boys suggested spending an hour down town in the evening, playing billiards. This at first struck Willie as being wrong. But thinking that the boys were older, and knew more than he did, he decided it would be safe to follow them, and accordingly, that night, Willie went for the first time to the saloon, and played billiards. After playing awhile his companions called for liquor. Willie was at first surprised, but thinking that the boys knew best, he drank with them his first glass.

The visits to the saloon were repeated nightly, and the drinks became to Willie a source of enjoyment; so much so that his mind was occupied during the day, thinking of the evening's revelry. As time wore away, his appetite for liquor became overpowering, and, neglecting his school duties and frequently being absent, he was finally expelled from school; after which his time was mostly spent in the drunkards' follies.

About this time there was a temperance movement in the place, and one of the leaders in the movement, learning of Willie's case, resolved to save him if possible. He first visited him at his home and talked kindly to him, invited him to attend a temperance lecture with him in the evening, and obtained his promise to do so. The gentleman called for him early, and on the way to the lecture conversed with him on the evils of intemperance.

At the close of the lecture Willie was the first to sign the pledge; and that night went home a sober boy for the first time in many months. But the watchful care of Willie's new friend did not cease there. He planned visits with him either at his own home or the homes of some of his temperance friends, or went with him to lectures every evening, so that Willie would not be tempted to go to the saloon for company. Not long after Willie signed the pledge there was a protracted meeting commenced in the upper part of the town, for which Willie's friend was very glad, for he knew the weakness of human nature and the wiles of the enemy so well, that he feared Willie would not be safe without the assistance of divine grace. He therefore persuaded Willie to attend the meetings with him, hoping he would there find the Saviour. In this he was not disappointed, for Willie was soon convicted for his sins and led to trust in Christ for salvation, and experienced the joy of pardon and peace with God.

It was now his chief desire to obey the Saviour. He made the Bible his main study, and from this he learned that if he would be a disciple of Christ he must follow him in baptism. Knowing that there were different views entertained in the churches concerning baptism, he was anxious to know which was right. To settle this point he studied the Bible, from which he learned by the examples of Christ and his apostles, that baptism is the immersion of a believer in water. At least he learned how Jesus was baptized, and to follow him he knew was safe, and this he had a great desire to do.

Having heard that there would be an opportunity offered the next Saturday for those who wished to unite with the Baptist church by baptism, he repaired thither at the appointed time. After others had related their experience and desire to follow Christ in baptism, and had been received by the church, Willie told them how he was found by the worker in the temperance cause, and induced to sign the pledge, after which he was persuaded to attend the meetings, where he was convicted of his sins, and led to trust in Jesus for pardon and peace with God, which he had found to his great joy. And as Jesus commands, "Believe and be baptized," he wished to follow him in that beautiful ordinance.

The pastor then gave an opportunity for any who wished to question Willie concerning his Christian experience. Directly the leading deacon arose, and said, "I have one question to ask. I the young man a member of any secret society?"

Willie answered, "Yes; I am a member of the Sons of Temperance."

"Then," said the deacon, "we cannot receive you unless you renounce them; for we have a resolution on our church-book excluding all who are members of any secret society."

"Renounce the Sons of Temperance?" thought Willie; "renounce the instrument that has done so much for me? That saved me from a drunkard's grave, and perhaps from a felon's cell? Renounce those who have saved me from bringing my mother's gray hairs in sorrow to the grave? No; I cannot leave them and their good work, unless Jesus requires it."

Willie went home with a troubled heart. He believed he was, under the authority of Christ, to be baptized. But the church had refused to baptize him. What should he do? He did what all Christians should do in trouble; he bowed before God and asked him to show him what he should do. He then told his mother of his great trouble. She advised him to study the Bible, and learn that Christ and his apostles had made conditions of church membership. He said he had done that, and proved that it was "repentance toward God, and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ," and baptism. His mother then suggested that perhaps those resolutions that forbade him to be baptized were peculiar to this church, and were not adopted by Baptist churches generally. She then advised him to go and talk with the pastor of the church in the town of D——, about six miles distant. This Willie did at the first opportunity. On his way, his heart was rejoicing in the love of Christ, and he felt that he could trust all in his hands. Mr. Brown, the pastor, met him at the door with a smile and welcome, and invited him into his study. Willie then told him his desire to be baptized, and on what account he had been refused by the other church. Said the pastor to him, "Why do you wish to be baptized?"

Willie replied, "Jesus commands it, and I wish to obey."

The pastor then told him to come to their covenant-meeting next Saturday, and tell his wishes to the church. This Willie gladly did, and was received into the church by baptism.

Willie is now an active, consistent member of the church, ever ready to help on the temperance cause, and is particularly interested in the young men of his school.

[SEQUEL NEXT WEEK.]

Romanism and the South.

"Father Ryan (formerly of Augusta, Ga.) made himself notorious last week by delivering in New Orleans a lecture advocating a new Rebellion against the Federal Government."—Exchange, Nov. 26, 1874.

This is the Father Ryan whose lecture on "The South" was delivered in Atlanta in the spring of 1869, in which he avowed himself an unreconstructed rebel, and declared that he would "scarcely give absolution to one taking the oath of allegiance to the United States Government." . . .

He is the same Jesuit priest who edited "The Banner of the South," in Augusta, Ga., through the columns of which paper he belched forth treason to his heart's content till 1870, when the paper changed its name and editors. It was by means of this paper and his lectures that he threw his Jesuit coils around "two hundred and sixty members of Protestant churches in August," and gathered them into the Romish Church, because they loved the Confederacy more than they loved Protestant Christianity. One of them, a leading man in Augusta, when asked why he left the M. E. church South for the Popish church, said: "I staked my all on this Confederacy, and thought God was on our side; I have lost my faith; but I hate the Yankee Government, and I do not find any church that hates it so much, and yet is so independent of it, as the Roman Catholic church. The Pope is the only ruler who recognized our independence as a Confederacy [a fact for Christian statesmen to ponder] so as I am still a rebel, I owe my allegiance to him." This was his reason for going. What the two hundred and fifty-nine others thought may be learned from the columns of Father Ryan's "Banner of the South." This "Father Ryan" was the chosen orator also at a Protestant college in Virginia, in 1871.

But he is not alone in his sympathy from the South, nor his success in winning the sympathy of Protestants. One of the greatest ovations was given in this city last winter to Bishop Goss, the new Roman Catholic Bishop of this diocese; and certain Protestants were formost in their praise.

What Protestantism may do in the South is standing against the wiles of Romanism, I know not; but it must do better than heretofore in giving instruction to the people, or else we may have the scenes repeated which have heretofore taken place in some of our cities. "A few years ago a general outpouring of the people took place at Madison, Ga., to see a Romish priest offer Mass in a Baptist church there." That church would not pollute its house any more by suffering pagan sacrifices to be offered within its walls.

Romanism has recently, through the influence of Bishop Goss and certain Protestant sympathizers, secured fifty thousand dollars from the city of Macon, Ga., toward building a new Roman Catholic college in that city. And the School Board of Savannah seems ready by its recent action to divide the public School Fund with the Papists.

Romanism is without doubt making use of rebel sympathy and confederate hopes to win the people to itself, and it is succeeding in Atlanta, Augusta, Savannah, Mobile, etc.

The political ascendency in this country is what Romanism covets, and if possible means to secure. Gen. Sherman's name would not be so objectionable here as many good men think, if the Papish church can see in him a candidate for the Presidency upon whom they can unite their forces and make a stepping stone to political power; and when presiding elders of the M. E. church South say as the presiding elder of the Dalton district said in 1870, that he would rather live under the Pope of Rome than under the Yankee Government, it indicates the readiness to be coworkers in advising a new Rebellion, not only at New Orleans, but even in Georgia; or it shows at least that the hope of Romanism is not in vain in seeking political power in this government. Unless the Protestant churches of the South are thoroughly "reconstructed," Popery will use their indifference to national unity to secure national political pre-eminence for itself.—Methodist Advocate, Atlanta, Ga.

At the meeting of the Rhode Island Temperance Union, Governor Howard, in a very able speech, gave his decided testimony as a representative public man, that the prohibitory laws of that State, owing to the character of those appointed to execute them, if not a complete success, are a success beyond the anticipation of any of their friends. In his opinion, the principle of prohibition is permanently established there. Throughout the rural portion of the State, there was never so great a charge in the matter of public order as within the last few months.

Our National Christian Record.

[From the address of Rev. D. Mealister before the Boston Convention for the Religious Amendment.]

The Christian character of the nation can hardly be doubted when we examine the records of our early history. The country was settled by Christians; not by colonies of Jews, nor by colonies of Mohammedans, or of pagans, but by Christian colonists coming here on account of their devotion to Christianity. And as they came as Christians, they incorporated the principles of their Christianity into all the civil institutions which they built up. This cannot be doubted for a moment when we examine the colonial charters and the colonial legislation founded upon them. It may be claimed that this was the case with some, but that with others it was entirely different. It has been maintained that in Rhode Island there was an entire separation of the State from religion; that Rhode Island was really the basis of a true, free Commonwealth; that it was the germ of all the free institutions which have since developed in our land. It is true that the colony of Massachusetts was guilty of more or less persecution, and that Roger Williams was compelled to flee in 1634; that two or three years later, Mrs. Hutchinson and Mr. William Coddington and others were also compelled to leave Massachusetts, and that these colonists went to Rhode Island, and there laid the foundation of that colony and State. Justice Story makes the remark, that every colony and every State at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States did acknowledge Christianity, "unless it be the single exception of Rhode Island." But even that he does not assert to be an exception; he merely mentions, in a somewhat doubting way, the uncertainty. But if we examine the records of that colony, we will find that even Rhode Island was not an exception. Let me read the original compact entered into by those who founded the colony. In March, 1638, they subscribed to this compact: "We, whose names are underwritten, do hereby solemnly, in the presence of Jehova, incorporate ourselves into a body politic; and, as he shall help, will submit our persons, lives and estates, unto our Lord Jesus Christ, King of kings, and Lord of Lords, and to all those perfect and absolute laws of his given in his holy Word of Truth, to be judged and guided thereby." This compact embraces every one of the great principles which this proposed amendment has in view: An acknowledgement of the supremacy of Jehova, an acknowledgement of the rule of Jesus Christ and of the supreme authority of the Word of God as the foundation of law.

In the evening after prayer by Rev. Woodruff Post and singing by Mr. Clark, Elder Barlow delivered an address on the religious nature of the lodge, and after the transaction of various items of business the convention adjourned sine die.

The New York State Meeting—Letter from the General Agent.

WAVERLY HOUSE, ROCHESTER, N. Y., Dec. 31, 1874.

DEAR K:—I have been of late personating the "Wandering Jew," and have been so constantly at work, or on the move, that I have had no time to write more than was absolutely necessary. I left Mount Victory, Ohio, on the morning of the 21st, and reached Lockport, N. Y., on the evening of the 22d, in time to attend the first session of the N. Y. State meeting. Bro. Barlow had been at work for a few days previous in and about Lockport, awakening a local interest; and at the time appointed took the chair, and after appropriate opening exercises read a very clear, able and comprehensive paper reviewing the past and suggesting wisely for the future.

The audience was not large, but the fixed attention to be seen in the faces of nearly all showed that the men and women of the convention were there for a purpose, and augured well for the future.

Wednesday morning opened auspiciously with a half hour's devotional exercises. Committees were appointed, etc., and the remainder of the day session was given to business and general discussion. The evening was assigned to the General Agent of the N. C. A. and well attended. The craft, as I am told and according to report of the local press, were largely represented. Good order prevailed and the audience seemed much interested. Bro. Post, from Rochester, arrived in time for the evening session, and was warmly welcomed by the convention. He has been for three years a target for the envenomed shafts of the relentless secret foe in western N. Y.; but, thank God, he still lives with untarnished character, and although somewhat impaired in health he is ready at his Master's call for every encounter.

The third day's session was inspired by the presence of new arrivals. D. Kirkpatrick, of Syracuse, and Bro. B. F. Roberts, of Rochester, came to augment the efficiency of those in advance, and as we looked into each other's faces and grasped each other's hands we all grew stronger and more determined in our work. The forenoon was given to general discussion and business. At noon we sat down to a sumptuous repast for which we felt grateful to the Giver and those by whose liberal hands it had been provided. The afternoon session was spirited, and developed a mighty "reserve force," ready at the Master's call to spring forward and take up the shield of our fallen heroes, as they pass to higher rewards. Bro. Post spoke with marked effect of the dangerous character of secret orders to the church, alluding to some instances in which he had been made to feel its withering power. His appearance was care-worn and anxious, but his resolve was taken and neither threat or assault could intimidate or change his purpose. He spoke of deeds as dark and dastardly as ever stained the records of attempted social and moral assassination, but with the absence of every trace of bitterness even to his persecutors, while it secured the attention of his hearers, won their sympathies, and made us feel that Bro. Post was not only a persecuted man, but that persecution was wholly vindicative and without occasion on his part. Bro. Roberts and others followed with stirring brief speeches and cogent arguments.

The evening was assigned to Bro. Barlow, whose address on the religion of Freemasonry was a most masterly and unanswerable argument. It must be heard from Bro. B's own lips to be appreciated. I hope the pastors throughout the State will avail themselves of Bro. B's services in aid of this our common cause. Brethren, if you want to know what Freemason religion is, as given by its own "Worshipful masters, priests and High Priests", send for your State Lecturer, Rev. J. L. Barlow, Syracuse, and he will give you more facts in a single lecture than you can obtain from fifteen dollar's worth of books and by a month's hard study. After the addresses the meeting adjourned to meet at the call of the State Executive Committee.

As a whole this meeting was a success. The indebtedness of the Association was canceled, and provision made for an enlarged, and it is believed a more vigorous prosecution of the work for the coming year. Bro. Barlow enters upon the work with experience of the past to aid him and many warm friends to sustain him with their co-operation, purses and prayers. The Association voted to continue Bro. B. in the lecture work for the year, fixing his salary at $1.000. Those present paid and pledged liberally, but with the utmost efforts the larger part of the salary is yet to be raised. The brethren in the front have done nobly and I trust their confidence in friends not at the meeting has not been misplaced. Brethren, will you not send a consecrated offering to this great work to the Treasurer of the State Association, Montgomery Merrick, Syracuse, N. Y., or to H. L. Kellogg, No. 13 Wabash Ave., Chicago, as may be most convenient?

I had purposed to speak of my visit to Lewiston, where I spoke three times and saw places of historic interest to every Anti-mason, and where I shook the hands of some whose affidavits I have read in the trial of Morgan's abductors, and also of my business visit to Syracuse, and with an interview with the Executive Committee, etc., but I am admonished that this is already too long. I expect to be in Cleveland, O., to-morrow morning. Yours etc.

J. P. Stoddard.

Elder Rathbun's Home Work.

Hammond, St. Lawrence Co., N. Y., Dec. 26, 1874.

Agreeably to notice for a lecture by D. P. Rathbun, a large audience assembled in the Wesleyan Methodist church in Macomb, St. Lawrence county, N. Y., on the evening of December 17th, 1874. After an introductory service of singing and prayer the lecture commenced with a pledge to prove that Freemasonry claimed to be a religious institution with power to make its votaries free from sin, although it rejected Christ and denied the authority of the Bible. The lecture was what might be expected from brother Rathbun. Pledge sustained by books known to be Masonic authority.

The interest of the meeting was greatly increased by the timely remarks of a gentleman from Carthage, N. Y., a well informed man, an adhering and advanced Mason. The lecturer was complimented by him as a man of intelligence and correctness in his exposition. Brother Rathbun politely returned the compliment by saying he thanked him for his honest position, and added that he is the most gentlemanly spoken and honorable Mason he had ever met. The visitor called upon the speaker for the obligations as contained in the Master Mason's degree, which, if he would present, an answer should be given. After the obligation had been repeated, the reply was, the obligations repeated were mainly correct.

On Friday evening, Dec. 17th, it was feared the snow storm then prevailing would prevent a general attendance; but the people began to assemble at an early hour. The congregation was much larger than the previous evening. Deep interest was apparent. Lecture commenced with a reference to the antiquity of Freemasonry, and then as had been previously announced the speaker told the audience how he was made a Master Mason; divested of his main clothing, drawers rolled up above his knees; cable-tow three times around his body; then facetiously inquired if they would be pleased with the appearance of their minister if he should come into the church in that condition. On Friday, a Mr. Ward and Mr. Staunton, both adhering Masons, called on brother R. to ascertain if the books read from on Tuesday evening were genuine Masonic authority. Mr. Ward took in writing the name of the publishing firm. He had brought with him his Monitor to compare with that used in the lecture. Clark and Maynard were the publishers. The question of authority was settled. The parties exchanged Monitors and Ward's was the book of reference Friday evening. Ward being present that fact was stated and it was a quietus to the gibberish of Masons present. Good order and quiet prevailed. The impressions were indicative of advancement. A large majority of those present were in sympathy with the Anti-masonic effort. One member of the lodge said he had heard only the sunny side and had now come to hear the opposite, was thankful for instruction received, and said he should abandon the institution. A public invitation was given for the pastor of the M. E. church to attend with the assurance he should have the privilege to defend his beloved Masonic institution. He did not put in an appearance though living near by; but was actively engaged in misrepresenting the lectures and lecturer. It is believed great good will result from these exhibitions of truth.

Some have supposed a public lecture on that infidel system would check the blow of spiritual enjoyment in other exercises. We had a demonstration to the contrary. Lectures closed Friday evening. The regular quarterly meeting commenced Saturday, at 2 P. M. Brother Rathbun preached four times during its session with great power and profit. Saturday evening was a weeping and rejoicing time, as was also the love-feast Sabbath morning. Shouts of joy and songs of praise, amid narrations of experience, accompanied by the direct witness of the Spirit, were evidences of the Divine appearance.

J. J. Emmes.

Southwestern Illinois—From the State Agent.

Sandoval, Ill., Dec. 30, 1874.

Dear Bro. Kellogg:—My visit to Randolph and Washington counties was one of much interest. The United and Reformed Presbyterian churches are numerous and strong, and they are making their influence felt. I spoke seven times in four days, and though the weather and roads were very bad, and the nights dark and rainy, the attendance was quite good and I felt that I had the sympathy of nearly all who attended.

At Eden I spoke in a large Reformed Presbyterian church, built forty years ago. Its high pulpit and antiquated style was in marked contrast with some of the churches more recently built in that vicinity. Here and at Sparta were the strong holds of anti-slavery strength in Southern Illinois. Here the panting fugitive found refuge and assistance, and here the spirit of reform still abides in the hearts of God's people and leads them to battle for the right as zealously as of old. One Mason at Eden acknowledged that my presentation of Masonry was substantially correct, but still thought it a good institution.

These churches are most interested in obtaining a religious amendment of the Constitution. To them it seems that National reform underlies all other reforms, and that the fact that the nation as such, does not recognize God's authority as supreme, nor Christ as the rightful Governor of the world, prepares the way for the denial of Christ in other relations.

They are holding a series of meetings to promote this cause, and expect soon to hold an important convention in St. Louis. They also propose to hold a convention of all those opposed to secret societies in Randolph and the adjourning counties, to meet at Centerville on Wednesday, Feb. 24, at 10 A. M. There is reason to think that it will be an important and profitable meeting. Yours for Christ,

H H Hinman.

To Testifying Baptist Churches.

Menomonie, Dunn Co., Wis., Dec. 28, 1874.

Dear Cynosure:—As the Menomonie First Baptist Church, of which I am pastor, is organized in opposition to all forms of oath-bound secrecy, I desire that some one member of each and all Baptist churches in the country, organized on the same basis, would correspond with me, giving their location, number, relative social strength in the community around, how the battle goes, if they are determined to stand firm in the good cause, and if they are making aggressive movements to shed the light upon the darkness around them. It would be highly interesting, and perhaps very encouraging to know who and how many of our brethren are with us in this matter, and possibly this knowledge might be turned to good account for all concerned, enabling us, by the help of God, to devise some plan of mutual co-operation for the spread and triumph of the truth.

Yours truly, W. W. Ames.

Elder Baird Gains his Libel Suit.

Royalton, Pa., Dec 28, 1874.

Dear Cynosure:—Again we would inform your readers of the work and labor of the craft in the Mercer county court in Pennsylvania last week. At 10 o'clock, A. M., on Tuesday, Dec. 22d, the case of the commonwealth against D. L. Calkins, editor of the Jamestown Sun, of Jamestown, Pa. Elder J. R. Baird, prosecutor, was called. The trial lasted till after dark, with all manner of shirking and shuffling and crafty cross-questioning. They brought a number of Masons and "jacks" to prove that Baird had murdered a woman in Canada some years ago, and kept him over an hour on the stand as a witness, being cross-examined by a low, unprincipled lawyer, who was at the last election put in for county judge like some of the lowest of the people who were put in high places of power in the days of Jeroboam. The present sitting judge is also a drunkard and a Freemason, who in all the trial acted perfectly Masonic. The drift of the whole matter was to get the people to believe that Baird had committed murder; taking care all the while to hide the fact that Freemasons alone were responsible for the murder. D. L. Calkins is not a Freemason but a very zealous 'jack.' The fraternity up to this time pretended to have no interest in his case whatever; but when his case came to be tried nearly every Freemason in Jamestown, and many from elsewhere were present to back up the "jack," who was being tried for libel, but after all their fuss and Masonic fury for seven hours, the jury retired and returned in an hour bringing a verdict of guilty against D. L. Calkins. The thing did not come out Masonic enough to suit them and they have appealed for a new trial. So goes the battle.

Elder J R. Baird.

Methodists in Earnest.

The following letters speak for themselves. The first is from a new acquaintance. The second from an aged Episcopal minister:

———, Mass, Dec. 27, 1874.

Rev J. Blanchard,

Dear Brother in Christ:—I forward you ten dollars to help along the Christian reform cause. My whole heart is in its prosperity. The Methodist Episcopal church here became almost extinct. They have been cursed with three Masonic ministers; everything went hard. This year we have one that is free from all secret societies His labors have been blest with twenty-five conversions. Please acknowledge through the Cynosure. A. Smith.

The following sounds like the voice of a Hebrew prophet. Read it.

Editor Cynosure:

"The triumphing of the wicked is short." This brief saying is not to be considered by itself. To the unreflecting, a day, a week or a year may seem long. This is judging from present feeling and not from the reason and nature of things. By this last rule, fifty or a hundred years dwindle to a short space when it is gone.

How true is the above motto when applied to secretism,—to Masonry.

When I was a boy of fourteen years I was employed to labor where a Masonic lodge was held. The bedroom where I slept was joining the room where the Masons had retired from their foolish labor for refreshment. I was large and able to do a man's work, and when night came needed rest, but the drunken Masons with their lewd songs and filthy jests made it impossible for me to sleep. The sound waves of their wicked merriment easily passed through the partition wall.

That night I shall never forget. One of the fraternity, a corpulent fellow, wished to retire a moment; thought he had found the door; got part way out of an upper story window which was left open to let in fresh air. He would have dashed upon the earth below if a brother Mason less drunk than himself had not caught him and pulled him back and thus saved him from the pit. (This I heard by an uncle, a member of the lodge.)

Another of the brotherhood of that time might be seen running about the country, leaving his wife, an excellent woman, to take care of herself as best she could. Another of this den, a great scoundrel, was known to say that there was not an honest man in the world, and he did not pretend to be better than others. This last one was very sick and expected to die; sent to him who afterward was my father-in-law, to pray for him; but before he could come was better. Then he swore he never would repent. I was then and afterwards well acquainted with all that company—all that composed that lodge. That drunken assembly are now all off the stage of life, a considerable proportion of them did not live past middle age. Nothing more is now said about the grand lodge above. They are and will be judged as others who have lived in the flesh. The scene described was sixty yeas past, yet it is still fresh in my memory.

I am sometimes blamed for not respecting Freemasonry and for not confiding in men of the lodge. I would sooner respect any other wing of the devil's army than these who are sworn to keep each others secrets in all cases, and to help each other into a good place and out of every difficulty. Times have changed. All lodges may not have sunk as low as the one I had a hearing of.

All men need good principles. Men are seldom better than their principles. Masonic principles, political and religious, are unchangeably bad; what wonder if they are a bad set! Good men among them are a strange exception to the rule.

Take courage, my friends, who are n the heat of the battle against this wing of Satan's army. The protracted time may seem tedious to human patience, but when the foe is vanguished it will seem like a watch in the night. There is a circumstance, flattering to the fraternity, which leads on to their destruction. They say the more the subject is agitated the more will join them. This saying may be partly true. When the whole scheme of Freemasonry is unfolded, some of the worst men who listen see a short-lived opportunity for the indulgence of their weakness. So off they go and enter this strong-hold of sin, and when they get into any trouble thereby, they have sworn friends to aid and assist to extricate them be they right or wrong. This corrupt motive determined the course of that bad man in De Kalb. After C. A. Blanchard, in his lecture, had sqown up the demoralizing nature of the craft he said he had long been disposed to join the lodge, his mind was now made up. So as an ox goes to the slaughter he went into the lodge. After an assault on several ladies he was off to another place where, by the aid of sworn friends, his ill fame sould be termed all lie.

In the mean time while the conflict is going on, all that's worth any thing in the lodge is gradually and continually leaving; fleeing out of it as men flee out of a sinking ship. Soon there will be none left in these dens of infamy but the most corrupt in principle, in heart and life. Then the vile thing will go down rapidly. Its claims of goodness and sanctity gone, nothing can uphold it. We may have political trouble first. Parties will be corrupted by these secretists more and more. Time is required for new parties to gain the acsendency. Dark days may intervene, but the time is rapidly hastening on when those sighing, laboring ones who oppose this monster evil, will joyfully say, "I have seen the wicked in great power, spreading himself like a green bay tree, yet he passed away and lo he was not. Yea I sought him but he could not be found." G. Sovereign.

The Seventh Day Sabbath.

Fremont, Wis., Dec. 22d, 1874.

Christian Cynosure:

I have been a subscriber from your first year, and as my paid-up subscription ends with the last of this month.

I have been looking over your editorial on Christmas, and I am in sympathy with you, and have been for many years. I believe there is no foundation in Scripture by command or example, to commemorate on any day, much less the 25th of December, the birth of the Saviour of mankind.

The death of Christ is the crowning glory of the Christian system. The evangelists testify to this, and Christ himself also by his charge at his last supper: "This do in remembrance of me: for as oft as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye do show the Lord's death till he comes." Thus I conclude with you that it is, or was an attempt by Satan to turn away from the crowning grace of Christ's mission.

Now I want to inquire, where in God's Word are we warranted in keeping 52 days in a year, in memory of Christ's resurrection, what nominal Christians call the Christian Sabbath. I read of a Sabbath of the Lord God, not of a Jewish or Christian Sabbath. Christ says (Matt. v.), "I came not to destroy the law or the prophets, but to fulfil. Verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or title shall not pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." "Whosoever shall break one of the least of these commandments and teach men, shall so be called the least in the kingdom of heaven." It is evident what law the Saviour was speaking of; the law of God's moral law, contained in the ten commandments, and the fourth is one of those commandments, which says the seventh day is "the Sabbath of the Lord thy God."

But this day that God sanctified is trodden under foot, and another has been substituted for it called Sunday, after the venerable God of the heathen, the sun. Now, where is the authority for this change? has God changed the day, has he blotted out the day, and given another in its place? if so, where is the record of it? Is it not of the same origin, as you say, that Christmas dates from paganism? You admit the death of Christ was the crowning glory of his mission, why then keep 52 days to commemorate his resurrection, and thereby desecrate 52 days the Lord has commanded us to keep holy? For my part I am trying to keep the day that God has commanded me to keep, and have no sympathy for the pagan Sunday, or the Sunday law, or the religious amendment, which I think will fulfil a prophesy in the 13th of Revelation. I think as the beast is considered to be the papacy, the image of the beast will be Protestantism, and will enforce by legislation, Sunday-keeping under heavy penalty, and perhaps even to death, those who will not have his mark in their foreheads on their hands. (See Rev. xiii.) Therefore I can never give my support to what is called the religious amendment.

Yours respectfully,

R. M. Lampard.

OUR MAIL.

Wm. Sherman, Deer River, N. Y., writes:

"I have lived through two wars in this country and have been swindled out of three or four hundred dollars by the craft, and still live. I do not wish to injure them as men and neighbors, but I know their institution to he dishonest and corrupt, and have for the last fifty years, and I mean to expose it, so far as I can honestly. . . I hope your committee will get up a platform that all the friends of freedom will endorse, and not try to kill too many birds with one stone. Secretism is what we want to put down, and there is no other way to do it except through the ballot-box."

Mark H. Pomeroy, Manchester, N. Y., writes:

"The more I read your paper the better I like it, and I wish to continue it from year to year as long as I live."

E. J. Chalfant, York, Pa., writes:

"I am doing all I can to get Pennsylvania organized and at work. Am also doing all I can for the cause in general. I intend to let the secret society question 'bother my brains' very much this winter, and I hope a little good will result from it."

Thos. Mayne, Mason City, Ia., writes:

"I will be one of the happy number to six subscriptions for 1874, and will remit for the same by January 1st, 1875."

O. C. Stoughton, Maquoketa, Ia., writes:

"Please put me on your muster roll. Here is one of the six to start with."

S. G. Barton, Hopewell Center, N. Y., writes:

"Brethren, count on me for one of Bro. Hickman's regiment, hereby reporting for duty."

J. B. Stinespring, La Fayette, Ind., writes:

"The Christian Cynosure was handed to me by a friend, Mr. Calvert, of Milford, Ind. I have been thinking of joining a secret society until now. I wish to have you paper."

J. C. Halsted, Windsor, O., writes:

"Put me down for a life subscriber, and may God bless you in your ardent labor."

Stephen Bayles, Morning Sun, Ia., writes:

"I have got two new subscribers. My heart is with you in your arduous work. I am in my seventy-fourth year, and hardly expect to see Masonry fall as I have seen slavery. But it must and will certainly come down."

Rev. J. C. King, Chase City, Va., writes:

"I only wish that I could afford to furnish the paper to all the members of my branch (Presbyterian) of the church, North and South. I have spoken to quite a number of persons in this region about subscribing for the paper. They are very much opposed to secret societies, but with one consent, decline to subscribe for the paper that is doing more to enlighten, as to the true character of these societies, than any other. They remind me very much of a brother minister, who was a decided Anti-secret society man, but was rather criticising me for having preached a sermon showing their claims as to religion. He said he had never read on the subject, and felt that he had more important work to do. But afterwards urged me to write a book on the subject, as I had made it a study, and was prepared to enlighten the people. I replied, 'If everybody was like you, nobody would read my book after it was written.' I paid for and requested you to send the Cynosure to a good brother occupying an important position in Iowa, some years ago, and who professed to be very much opposed to secret societies; and I learned afterwards, from you, that he returned the paper to your office—such is poor human nature, partially sanctified—'the fear of man bringeth a snare'—while duty dictates to 'Trust in the Lord and do good.' A good brother of the United Presbyterian church and I had just deposited our ballots, in connection with several other radicals (as we are called here) at the recent election, and as we were walking away, remarked 'Radicalism is looking up here!' So, of our cause, a tional meeting was noticed by scarcely a single political paper a year or two ago, but the recent State meeting in Chicago I see noticed in almost every political paper I have read. I told the brother who wanted me to write a book, but who was not willing himself to even read on the subject; that before ten years he would be preaching on the subject himself. I think your paper is greatly improved since its enlargement; indeed I consider it one of the most evangelical papers that I read. I trust the editor-in-chief,—the publishers, lecturers, and others that are laboring so faithfully for so little pecuniary renumeration,—will he abundantly rewarded in this life in seeing the good work in which they are engaged, abundantly successful in forming a public sentiment that will rid both church and state of the anti-Christian and and anti-republican associations."'

Mr. King sends ten dollars to pay for five different subscribers, and hence may be reckoned among Mr. Clark's one hundred.

Wm. Vineyard, Lynnsville, Ia., writes:

"I wish . . . great success for the Cynosure, hoping it may work a thorough reform morally and politically and religiously; we need such a reform the world over. You will please to send me one of your blank petitions for the purpose of getting subscribers to petition Congress to revoke the Freemason's charter. You may consider me a life subscriber to your valuable paper."

Daniel Varney, Fond du Lac, Wis., writes:

"The people are uneasy, they are aflicted, and they know not for what; but the Lord shall open their eyes when he has sufficiently chastised them. Their liberty is departing; they know it not; they are stumbling in the dark, and are wandering wide from their coveted goal; but the light is beginning to shine upon this darkness, and he who can bear the light may yet have hope. Our watchmen are asleep, or are in complicity with the thief. Our watchmen are hirelings, and receive their wages not only from the just, but from the unjust. And he dare not open his mouth to reprove, and so he becomes a co-worker in the unfruitful works of darkness. What we need is men and women to serve the Lord, instead of love of money. It is not a good thing to serve two masters; but the thing has become popular to serve the Lord in a way not to offend the devil."

J. S. Hickman, Wellington, Ill., writes:

"You can put me on the effective list, and shall try and give a good account of myself. not intending to flatter myself or be guilty of self-praise. . . . I hope you will encourage Mr. Hinman or some other man to lecture at Rossville, Hoopeston, Wellington, Milford, Watseka, Cresent, Onarga, Buckly, Loda, Paxton, Rankin, East Squire, Ashgrove and my neighborhood. United Brethren have now the finest church in this county."

E. Honeywell, Atlay, N. Y., writes:

"As long as I can write and act, I want to help demolish Satan's masked batteries I have about forty names asking Congress to withdraw its protection of a certain nuisance, and think all the blanks sent me by C. A. Blanchard will be returned with one or two hundred names."

T. J. McHenry, Geneseo, Ill., writes:

"Can we not have a commission merchant in Chicago that can help us or give us some information as to when is the best time to sell or to ship stock? . . I tried to raise money to send a delegate to your Convention, but could not. I am glad to hear that the cause is prospering in other places if it does not here. I am trying to hold to the Christian faith, but am one of a few. In many instances opposition appears to be pretty strong."

(If we can do anything about prices current, we will.) Christ says to his children, "Lo I am with you always."

Lewis Orcutt, Union, N. Y., writes:

"I receive your paper and lend it through the neighborhood. The people have not heard much about Masonry. I ask them what they think of secret societies, and they say they have not thought much about them. I hope your paper will set them to thinking. I mean to help the work what little I can. I hope when my subscription runs out to send you more subscribers. I believe that secret societies are evil, and that our country should be freed from them."

In answer to your question about petitions we would say, We certainly want the names of women on those petitions as well as of men. We hope there will be a noble roll of names received.

Rev. K. Bjorgo, Lake Park, Minn., writes:

"I am a deadly foe of all secret societies, and so are all ministers in the synod to which I belong. I belong to the Lutheran church, and to the synod for the Norwegian Evangelical Lutheran church in America. Our synod is quite large, numbering about fifty thousand communicants, four hundred congregations, and over one hundred ministers, and all are opposed to secret societies. We have been fighting them for the last six years, and we shall fight them henceforth even if we have to stand alone in the combat; but we know we are not alone, the Lord of hosts fights with us against their prowling sons of darkness. We are glad to learn that so many of the American people have at last awakened to see the threatening danger which is slowly creeping up in the form of secret societies, threatening both civil and religious liberty, —treasures so dearly bought, and which every loyal citizen has pledged himself to defend."

Lesson for Jan. 17, 1875.—Memorial Stones.

Joshua iv. 4–9.—Commit to memory verses 6, 7.

4 Then Joshua called the twelve men, whom he had prepared of the children of Israel, out of every tribe a man:

5 And Joshua said unto them, Pass over before the ark of the Lord your God into the midst of Jordan, and take you up every man of you a stone upon his shoulder, according unto the number of the tribes of the children of Israel:

6 That this may be a sign among you, that when your children ask their fathers in time to come, saying, What mean ye by these stones?

7 Then ye shall answer them, That the waters of Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the Lord; when it passed over the Jordan, the waters of Jordan were cut off: and these stones shall be for a memorial unto the children of Israel forever.

8 And the children of Israel did so as Joshua commanded, and took up twelve stones out of the midst of Jordan, as the Lord spake unto Joshua, according to the number of the tribes of the children of Israel, and carried them over with them unto the place where they lodged, and laid them down there.

9 And Joshua set up twelve stones in the midst of Jordan, in the place where the feet of the priests which bare the ark of the covenant stood: and they are there unto this day.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I will remember the works of the Lord; surely I will remember thy wonders of old.—Ps. lxxvii. ii.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—God's wonderful works are to be remembered.

BIBLE READINGS.—(1) Josh. iv. 4-9. (2) Gen. xxxi. 31-54; (3) Josh. xxiv. 22–31; (4) Deut. iv. 17-25; (5) Ps. xliv. 1-26; (6) Acts vii. 37-46; (7) Eph. i. 15–23.

PLACE.—River Jordan and Gilgal.

TIME.—About 1450 B. C.

The Bible assumes our tendency to forget; it is proof of God's love for us, that he desires to be remembered. There is fitness in the memorials—durable ones—a great object lesson, teaching Israel through the eye.

ANALYSIS.—I. The memorials set up—that near Gilgal, the place of their first encampment in Canaan, was by divine order; the other was in the Jordan. II. Their purpose—they would excite inquiry among the young; keep alive the memory of the crossing. Lessons to us: (1) Memory of divine acts to be preserved by the church. (2) Parents are to be careful to give their children this knowledge. (3) We are to remember divine acts.—Am. S. S. Union Series.

THE PURPOSE OF THE SIGN:—It was for the sake of the religious education of the young. Note this fact: The very first thing done, upon reaching the goodly land, was to make provision for the religious culture of children! Do we say that Robert Raikes invented the Sabbath-school? It was, however, but the re-invention of a "lost art." We suspect that in the pious homes of the ancient Hebrews there used to be some of the best Sabbath schools ever held. And one of the best things about them was, they were conducted in a conversational way. And the children did the questioning. Another thing, the fathers did not shirk their responsibility and try to shift it all upon the mothers, as is so often done in these days, and as, it should be added, they are too often encouraged to do, by the indiscriminate manner which some have of speaking of the mother's influence.

Other memorials, appointed for similar purposes. See Gen. viii: 20. xii. 7; xxii. 9; xxxv. 3; Ex. xvii. 15; iii. 15; xii. 14; xxviii. 12 16; Ps. cxxxv. 13; Matt. xxvi. 13.

The Lord's Supper a memorial. See Luke xxii. 15-20.

(1.) The duty of keeping in perpetual and fresh remembrance the mercies that we have received, and all "the wonderful works of the Lord."

(2.) The influence this would have upon use, in connection with our hopefulness, and courage, our success, our character.

(3.) How the habit of lively remembrance may be cultivated.

(4.) The duty of parents to their children in this respect. Deut. vi. 4-12.

Forty Years Ago.

Historical Sketch of the Higher Degrees.

HENRY DANA WARD, 1829.

Without pretending to say, or to know, what Sublime Masonry is, we may inspect the character of the fountain from which it comes to us. If Sublime Masonry be of a nature in the least degree suspicious, a pure origin will wipe away suspicion; but a deistical origin may excite a doubt of its pretended Christian excellence, not doubted before.

Frederick II. of Prussia, as Grand Commander and Protector of Masons throughout the two Hemispheres, demands the first notice. In his train will follow his Grand Deputy, Chaillon de Jonville, with his associates. Prince de Rohan, Duc de Choiseuil, and others; the Grand Commander in Sweden, Prince Charles; and in France, the Duke of Orleans, &c.

It is abundantly evident from these pages, that Sublime Masonry, as it is falsely called, claims to be a most Christian institution, and may be it is; good Christians have been within its veils; but if the men whom the Sublime Sovereigns proclaim the Grand Commanders of Masonry, were active in the dissemination and faithful in the protection of Christian principles, it is a wonder worth knowing; and if they have, by cunning devices, palmed a false philosophy upon their pupils for true Gospel, it becomes all interested, to bring them to light.

What is a conspiracy? A secret combination of men to effect a dark design; whose members have a watch-word and tokens, a name for each other, and a name for their foe, known only to themselves; and in their intercourse with each other the conspirators use their mystical terms, to prosecute their schemes with less danger of detection.

Such a conspiracy in the last century existed against Christianity, and the Grand Commander of Sublime Masons was a principal in it. Frederick of Prussia did not play the jester; he did not enter into the protection and dissemination of the sublime degrees for the sake of the ribbons, and grand honors they bountifully bestow: his object was higher, and less innocent.

The Encyclopedists of France were members of the conspiracy; and Frederick, "the Solomon of the North," was their protector and coadjutor, equally with the Freemasons. Their word was, "Ecraser l'infame." Crush the wretch. (See Scott's Napoleon, chap. 7, or vol. 1, p. 117.) The name of Christianity, their foe, was L'infame, (the wretch;) the conspirators' name for Frederick was Duluc; for Voltaire, Raton, (a cat;) for D'Alembert, Bertrand by himself, but by the others, Protagoras: and the general name of the conspirators was Cacouac. (Abbe Barruel, vol. 1, p. 92.)

And this is their language, "I am weary of hearing people repeat, that twelve men have been sufficient to establish Christianity; and I will prove that one may suffice to overthrow it."—(Life of Voltaire, by Condorcet, his particular friend.)

In a letter to D'Alembert, 24th July, 1760, conspiring the destruction of the wretch, Voltaire inquires, "Could not five or six men of parts, who rightly understood each other, succeed after the example of twelve scoundrels who have already succeeded?" Observe the date, 1760.

Now let the reader say, that the impious attempts of Voltaire have no connection with the Grand Commander of Sublime Masonry; for Frederick, in a letter to Voltaire, of March 16th, 1771, admires his method of filliping the wretch while loading him with civilities; and again, Nov. 25th, 1766, styles Voltaire "the god of Philosophy," and represents him as "ascending Olympus, loaded and satiated with glory, the conqueror of the wretch, seated on a car beaming with light," &c. (Bar. 1 vol. p. 100.

Frederick believed that death is an eternal sleep, (Letter to Voltaire, 30th, Oct. 1770,) and joined himself with those who attempted to subvert every Christian altar; who urged their warfare with deceit: "Confound the wretch to the utmost of your power; speak your minds boldly; strike, but conceal your hand." (Voltaire to D'Alembert, May, 1761.)

And when Voltaire proposes to him open violence with the church, Frederick replies, (March 3d, 1767) "It is not the lot of arms to destroy the wretch; it shall perish by the arm of truth and interested selfishness." (Bar. 1 vol. p. 60.

Voltaire, in a letter to Damilaville, 15th June, 1762, declares, that for the preceding five and twenty years, "he had no other object in view than to vilify the wretch." (Bar. 1 vol. p. 95.)

In another to D'Alembert, (Let. 85, 1761.) "Let the real philosophers unite in a brotherhood like the Freemasons; let them assemble and support each other; let them be faithful to the association. This Secret Academy will be far superior to that of Athens, and to all those of Paris. But every one thinks of himself, and forgets that his most sacred duty is to crush the wretch." Bar. vol. 1, p. 69. Observe the date 1761.

"Crush the wretch; I tell you then, crush the wretch," a letter to D'Alembert, 129. (Bar. vol. 1, p. 99.)

It is not a little remarkable, that this advice of Voltaire's respecting "a brotherhood of real philosophers, similar to that of the Freemasons," was given in the same year with the appointment of brother Morin, to the Inspector General of the New World, &c. by a club of these philosophers. (The Grand Consistory of Paris commissioned brother Morin 27th Aug. 1761.)—Frederick did not dip his finger into Freemasonry for pastime; nor did these real philosophers create an office, till then unknown and never yet submitted to, viz: Inspector General of all the Lodges of the New World, for the dissemination of the doctrines they are pleased to denominate "the wretch." And what is more, no man before Frederick claimed to be, or was entitled by others, "Grand Commander and Protector of Freemasons;" and some of the Sublime degrees were the invention of his age and philosophic people.

What if it were so; who would introduce his anti-Christian degrees into this country? Stephen Morin was a Jew, and M. M. Hayes was a Jew, and without impeachment of their character, they could have no more difficulty in seeking to crush the wretch, than Voltaire himself.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JAN. 7, 1875.

REV. N. D. FANNING.—Those who attended the late meeting of the Illinois State Association at Chicago, heard from this gentleman one of the ablest speeches on that, or, indeed, on any occasion. The tone of his remarks was pure and elevated, pungent without acrimony, convincing with no parade of logic, and eloquent without any attempt at display. We are glad to be permitted to announce that he is willing to receive and answer applications to lecture against the lodge. He is pastor of "The Independent Church of Christ," of Marengo, Ill., where he may be addressed, and will reply promptly to requests to lecture in the reform.

I. R. B. ARNOLD.—Mr. Arnold has got up a series of panoramic views illustrated by a magic lantern, showing the imitation, swearing in and reception of Freemasons in the lodge. The views were produced by a Mason of sixteen degrees, and can be relied on as accurate. They give the murder, burial, and resurrection of Hiram Abiff, etc., etc. Mr. Arnold gives a lecture along with these pictorial life-and-death representations. This entertainment can hardly fail to draw a crowd in every village, while the instruction imparted, and the reading circulated, places it above the character of a show, and yet gives it the same power to amuse while it instructs the masses. Mr. Arnold's address is Sycamore, De Kalb county, Ill., where he will answer applications.

GERRIT SMITH.

This great and good man is fallen. He died suddenly at the residence of of Gen. John Cochrane in New York city, Dec. 28th, 1874, aged 77 years. In more than his usual health, he went to New York to spend the holidays among his friends. On Saturday, the 26th, he arose after a good night's sleep, was faint while dressing, and had only strength to utter "very weak," and sank into an unconscious state in which he remained until death, which came soon after noon on Monday.

He was born in Utica, New York, in March, 1797, graduated at Hamilton College in 1818, and devoted his immense fortune and untiring energies to the cause of humanity; and, as he understood it, to the Christian religion While yet a young man, he embarked in a national effort in behalf of the Sabbath; started a Sabbath-keeping line of stages through New York, and sustained it with a business energy which few men ever possessed. And although the Democratic party, and Richard M. Johnson's celebrated Sunday Mail Report, carried the country against the law of God, yet the struggle was nobly sustained, and diffused its light and luster over this country and Europe And the appalling increase of crime, insanity and general misery, has flowed from that formal national repeal of God's law. The railroad and telegraph have demonstrated the fallacy and falseness of the plea that necessity required the use of the Sabbath for the transmission of the mail. For though steam has five times multiplied the speed of the mail the clamor for Sabbath mails is louder and stronger than when the rate of travel was from four to six miles an hour.

The impossibility of rallying the members, even of othodox and evangelical churches, to the rescue of the Sabbath damped the youthful ardor of Mr. Smith's attachment to, and confidence in, the churches and ministry; and caused that strong leaning away from the sacred Scriptures to reason and philanthrophy, which marked his after life. This, doubtless, was a grievous error. Men think with their leaders, and Christ himself was, humanly speaking, the product of the church, whose leaders crucified him when he came. So that it by no means follows that because the churches are misled into error, that they are not churches of Christ.

The national grapple with the Masonic lodge came next. Mr. Smith, born March 6th, 1797, was still in his early prime,—about thirty years of age. He sustained the Anti-masonic movement, and we have heard him say, in his old age, that he could never look on the jail at Canandaigua without a feeling of gloom and foreboding that a guiltless American citizen could be shut up within its walls to be delivered to horrible persecution and death. And it is a proof of the corruption and degeneracy of the American press, which is now discussing the life and character of this great American, that it blinks or ignores his bold stand and earnest labors against the lodge.

The Anti-masonic movement of forty years ago, primarily political, though outwardly for a time successful, failed to extirpate a religious evil, and went down in 1831–2, in which years the slavery issue arose. The lodge hid its shattered image in the dust raised by the slavery-discussion, and under it slowly crawled back to popularity and power. But men like Gerrit Smith never forget the exhibit which Masonry made of itself, when, over the corpse of Morgan, in the words of Gov. Marcy, it "defied heaven and earth!" And the first moment when the lodge-discussion revived again, Mr. Smith hailed it and embarked, without hesitation in the movement which it has produced.

We saw him on the platform in Shakespeare Hall at the first modern Anti-masonic meeting there, then something over seventy years old, one of the finest human forms and the noblest countenances that have adorned and illustrated the human race. Indeed, Milton's description of Adam in Paradise seems scarcely an exaggeration when applied to him—

> "Whose large fair front and eye sublime declared
> Absolute rule; and hyacinthian locks
> Round from his parted forelock manly hung > Clustering"—

and though already passed the limit fixed by inspiration, the three score and ten allotted to human life, he seemed an exception to the race he adorned.

Mr. Smith had then, years since, forsaken the ministry of churches who refused to remember Christ in the least of human brethren, the slave. And but for such men as Beriah Green and Charles G. Finney, and others who rallied to Christ in the poorest of his poor, he might have completed his apostasy from the American church. For men, like forest trees, are apt to be blown over when left to stand alone.

His speech at the first State Convention in Syracuse will still be remembered by those who heard it; tender and forgiving toward the dupes of the lodge, yet inexorable toward the dark system itself as the sentence of a judge; culminating in the averment which the force of preceding argument made to seem unexaggerated and just. "Masonry," "Masonry," cried he, "had bedevelled its subjects!" It was the mildest theory which would account for their treason, perjury, abduction, murder, and foul fanaticism in the torture, imprisonment and death of William Morgan.

He accepted the office of President of the New York State Association, and held till his death his connection with that body.

We would be glad to review his Congressional life and dwell on his speeches and published books, but this would exceed the limits of an article. In him error itself seemed incapable of becoming heresy, for there was no malice in his heart against the truth. He is gone. And if our Republic shall survive her death grapple with the lodge, and Americans ever regain their reason, philosophy shall yet kindle anew at the wisdom and profundity of his utterances, and religion while she veils his errors with the blessings of the poor, shall learn in his history new lessons of practical devotion to God.

ILLINOIS STATE TEACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

This body has lately held its annual sessions in Chicago. The colleges and schools of Illinois were well represented by as able body of men and women as can be collected together in the State. The daily press had their reporters present, who have given the people of the State the substance of the discussions.

Dr. Allyn, of Carbondale, gave a paper on teaching and learning, in which he insisted that 'love of truth' and a 'fearless discharge of duty', were prime requisites. This is very well Yet we saw several high Masons, some of them Knights Templar, among the principals of our higher schools; among whom was Mr. Etter, lately elected State Superintendent of Schools in place of Hon. Newton Bateman, now President of Knox College.

We wish to put some plain questions to these gentlemen.

1. Would it be right for a company of children in one of your schools to form a secret combination to take undue advantage of those outside, in matters of common interest? If not, how can you hold up your heads among your fellow-teachers, while you are yourselves doing this very thing?

2. Would it be blasphemy in your pupils, should they swear each other by the name of God in their secret cabal? If so, how dare you do the same thing, and yet claim to be teachers of morals to the young?

3. Mr. Bateman urged at least one prominent teacher to join the Masonic order, as by so doing he would 'stand a better chance to rise in his profession of teacher' in the State. Was this your motive in joining the lodge? If so, how can you look the rest of us in the face without blanching, while you are conspiring to elevate yourselves above us, by no superior merit or honest desert, but by the grips and pass-words of a sworn, selfish, secret clan?

4. Whom do you pray to in the lodge? To the true God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ you dare not, for it is unmasonic, and all other prayers are idolatrous. Are you not, then, the basest of all idolaters, viz., those who knowing the true, practice false religion for personal and selfish motives?

5. We put each of these queries to Mr. Bateman, President of Knox College. How can you meet on terms of equal gentlemen and Christians, your neighbor, Dr. Wallace, of Monmouth, whose college is pledged by its religion against the secret order to which you belong, as an anti-Christ, and so accursed? Do you not owe it to God, to Knox College, and to your pupils, and to the religion which, as a Presbyterian, you profess to come out of a combination so odious to God and good men?—lodges, which your Presbyterian fathers used to call "Mau-traps of Satan", and your New England progenitors regarded with equal loathing and abhorrence?

NOTES.

—The Paris correspondent of the New York Tribune hints in the following at the affection for the lodge among the "principalities" of France:

"M. Jules Simon was telling this evening at M. Theirs' how Lord Ripon had passed, with arms and baggage, over to the enemy. The enemy is the church, according to M. Jules Simon, but he was delighted to see the heir-apparent of the Crown of Great Britain, the Prince of Wales, to call him by his name, accepting the position of Grand Master of Freemasons in Great Britain."

—If any of our readers are in doubt as to the story from the Standard, they are desired to be patient another week, when they shall have the sequel from Prof. W., who would have been a better doctor for the distressed youth than his mother or the pastor at D.

—The proposition of Bro. Ames, of Menononie, Wis., to the non-fellowshiping Baptist churches is an excellent one. The mere gathering of a few facts, though an important item, is of little moment to the consciousness of sympathy and strength every such church will gain from the information. Read the letter on the 7th page and answer as quickly and well as possible.

—Conventions in behalf of the Religious Amendment will be held in St. Louis, Jan. 27th and 28th; Leavenworth, Kans., Feb. 17th and 18th; Columbus, Ohio, March 10th and 11th. All these meetings will be addressed by able speakers.

—While in New York the King of the Sandwich Islands was shown through a Masonic temple and an effort made to suitably impress upon him the wonders of the order. The Freemasons of the city also gave him a reception last Wednesday evening. Whether Kalakaua is a Mason or not we need not inquire; the most important fact is the anxiety of the lodge to impress on the representatives of foreign nations its wonderful importance to the perpetuity of the United States. In this way the Japanese embassadors were treated a year or two since.

—The resolutions presented by the late Gerrit Smith to the first New York State Convention, and adopted and reaffirmed, are a testimony against the lodge which the power of his great influence should ring through the land. Let them be kept before the people as the witness of a great mind, which only gave its labor to live issues:

1. "That in the light of the fact that Masonry holds her laws to be paramount to all other laws; and in the light of the further fact that they are made, not in the behalf of the right, but in behalf of Masons right or wrong, it is clearly proper in every suit between one who is and one who is not a Mason, to call in question the impartiality and credibility of Masonic witnesses, and also to insist on the exclusion of Masons from the jury-box.

2. That in the light of the fact that Masonry murdered Morgan; and in the light of the further fact that it succeeded in baffling all attempt to punish the crime, we are forbidden both by Divine and human laws to clothe with civil office any of the adherents or upholders of Masonry."

ALBERT BARNES.—The opinion of the celebrated American on secret societies is found on our first page. Mr. Barnes was born near the village of Rome, N. Y., 1798. He graduated at Hamilton College in 1820, studied theology at Princeton, and was installed pastor over the First Presbyterian Church of Norristown, N. J., in 1825. He took charge of the First Presbyterian Church in Philadelphia in 1830, and continued to hold this position until compelled to relinquish it from the failure of his eyesight in 1867. He died in 1870. He was widely known as an eloquent and successful preacher, but best as author of critical and explanatory notes on the New Testament and part of the Old. These works have generally adopted as text books in Bible classes and Sabbath-schools; and more than 400,000 copies of the Notes on the New Testament have been sold in the United States, and an almost equal number in Great Britain. They have been translated into French, Welsh, and partially at least, into some of the dialects of the Oriental nations. Mr. Barnes has also contributed to theological literature a variety of sermons, addresses, essays, and reviews, a work upon slavery, and a treatise on the evidences of Christianity in the nineteenth century, containing the substance of a course of lectures delivered at the Union Theological Seminary, N. Y. His commentary on the Book of Psalms, which appeared in 1869, he announced, from age and failing vision, to be the close of his long labors in the department of religious literature, to which he had devoted so much of his time and study. It is a singular circumstance that all the "Notes" referred to, amounting to some fifteen or twenty volumes, and requiring of necessity a vast degree of patient industry, have been written before nine o'clock in the morning to avoid trespassing upon the daily professional pursuits of the author, a memorable instance of what one man can accomplish by system, resolution and an earnest purpose.

Co-education.

A paper read before the Illinois Teacher's Association, Dec. 31, 1874, by Pres. J. Blanchard.

Schools are the nation's fountains of thought, as churches are of its character. And the question of co-education is, whether men and women shall drink at the same springs.

Thirty-one years ago (1843), at the breakfast-table of Hon. John Bowring, M. P., in the house in London once occupied by the poet Milton, the conversation turned on female colleges in America, when a son of Mr. Bowring produced a burst of merriment by asking, "Why, pa, what degree do they give to the girl-graduates? Spinster of Arts?"

At that time the idea of a girl being admitted to a degree-conferring college, was, in England, regarded as simply ridiculous; and to this day the legacy of John Stuart Mill, of $15,000 to the first University in the United Kingdom which shall admit women to its halls, goes begging for an acceptance. In this country, Oberlin, which at first conferred no degrees, and perhaps one or two other incipient colleges, endured the reproach of admitting female pupils. These, and a few colleges exclusively for women, occasioned the outburst of laughter at the London breakfast. The youth who gave the joke was a member of London University, and that day received a prize at a distribution by the Earl of Carlisle; and the utter absurdity of young ladies receiving college honors nowhere at this time appeared plainer, or was asserted with more assurance, than in the colleges themselves.

Thirty years have produced a change. Now, colleges, universities, law schools, colleges of medicine, agriculture, and the arts open their halls to female pupils. The United States Commissioner (1873), gives five colleges in New England, eight in the Middle States, sixty-seven in the Western States, and seventeen in the Southern States, in which youth of both sexes are educated in the same studies and in the same classes. In these mixed institutions there were, last year (1873), a total of 8,141 female students; of whom 5,622 were in preparatory, and 2,519 in regular collegiate courses. This great revolution has come up from the practical masses and is not likely to go back.

Even old England, whose monastic regimen has excluded woman from her universities for a thousand years, since the days of Alfred, has relaxed her grimness so far as to establish separate colleges for women; and the universities of Oxford, Cambridge and London, deign to examine their ladygraduates, and certify their acquirements, though they refuse them diplomas and exclude them from their halls.

The first girls came forward for admission to the colleges like fawns out of a thicket, timidly approaching a public fountain, looking this way and that way before daring to drink. They came with trembling, and were received with fear. A brief experience dissipated the one and dissolved the other. President Angell, of the University of Michigan, says:

"The history of our work during the past year has only deepened the impression made during the two years preceding, of the entire practicability of co-operative collegiate and professional education of the two sexes in the same schools. If any have cherished a fear that the admission of women would tend to reduce the standard of work in the university, their attention may be directed to the fact, that, during the last three years, we have been steadily increasing the requirements for admission, and broadening the range of studies. And, certainly, the women experienced no such difficulty in acquiring the studies assigned in the regular curriculum, as to call for any modification of the course on their account. Their record is as creditable in all branches as that of the other sex. Nor do I see any evidence that their success in their intellectual pursuits has been purchased at the expense of their health. On the contrary I doubt whether the same number of young women in any other pursuit of life have been in better health during the year."

The testimony from the University of Wisconsin is substantially a repetition of that from the University of Michigan.

The immediate cause of this revolution in favor of the co-education of the sexes, is a change of sentiment in the American masses, who could not see why their sons and daughters who had studied together during the waywardness of childhood in the common school and academy, should be separated in the college, when waywardness should begin, at least, to be sobered by reason and fire-tinged with discretion. Co-education is thus being forced on the colleges by popular sentiment. This is proved by the fact that the universities which are governed by legislatures and the popular vote, admit women; while Yale, Cambridge, and the old close corporations exclude them. And there are no signs of reaction in the popular mind. Every year adds to the number of colleges admitting women; and none who have admitted them have cast them out. As at the cave of Cacus in Virgil, so at the colleges admitting women, Nulla vestigia retrorsum: The girls make no returning tracks.

On the contrary the progress of women in education outside the college is at least as marked is within it. In all the Northren States but two, the number of female teachers in 1873 exceeded that of males. New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Rhode Island have passed laws, making women eligible to office in the control and management of schools. Out of New England the change has been more rapid. Illinois, in 1872, declared by law, that any woman over 21, and possessed of of the qualifications required of men, should be eligible to school-office; and under this law eleven women were elected county superintendents in 1873. Nine were elected in Iowa under a similar law in that State. And Michigan and Pennsylvania have inserted provisions into their constitutions making women eligible to school-office. And the authorities of Dayton, Ohio, and other cities, speak of the administration of female principals in their public schools, as distinguished by that unwearied attention to details, which gave Cromwell and Napoleon their power to manage masses of men, combined with that gentleness whose power is mightier then force.

Mr. Commissioner Eaton speaks of this sunburst of women into American education as "an experiment." Perhaps it is. But it is one of those experiments grounded in reason and nature which carry their demonstration along with them. The first voyage around the globe was 'an experiment;' but it needed not a repetition to demonstrate the earth to be a ball. Surely it is against both nature and reason to cage young men and women apart, while they are learning to act their parts as protectors and helpmeets to each other in the economy of life. And if the cloister system contravenes reason and nature, much more does it the word. The Scriptures exhibit man and woman in their first origin, as companions in life's labor, under the law of God; and if in life's labor, then also in learning the theory of life, which it is the mission of the school to teach; and not this life only but that which is to come. And, in this regard, the globe itself is a school-house as well as a temple. The first object lesson was Abel's lamb teaching pardon by suffering innocence: and the last command of Christ was "Go TEACH:" and down the line of God's providence from Creation to Pentecost, woman appears as the companion, friend, and benefactress of man. She appears as a national deliverer in Esther; a judge and counsellor in Deborah; a patriot in Jael; a saint-mother in Hannah; an almoner in Dorcas; a church officer in Phebe; a teacher in Priscilla; and a Christian at the cross and sepulchre; and in each and all, these, and the myriad vocations which she filled along down the ages, she has needed the knowledge of a man in the breast of a woman, to fit her to act as the guide of childhood and youth, the ornament of society, and the guardian and glory of our race. And without substantially the knowledge which men have, above all the knowledge of human nature, and especially the human nature of young men, she may become a toy perhaps an idol ending in a drudge; but she can become in no just sense, either wife, sister, or friend.

For myself, an experience of nearly thirty years as president of a mixed college, which I entered at first, as did others, with doubts and misgivings, has so thoroughly converted me to its wisdom and beneficence that I would preside in no other. The arguments in favor of co-education, as I have found them, are succinctly these:

1. Women have contributed their full share to the endowment of American colleges, and it is unjust to exclude the daughters from the endowments given by their mothers.

2. No separate schools for females can compensate for this injustice. The cure for female frivolity is in the mixed school.

3. God has united the sexes in families, and priests separated them in convents and nunneries.

4. The reciprocal influence of the

The Home Circle.

A Winter Call.

J. B. CRESSINGER.

Cold, cold the winter wind doth blow,
And thicker falls the feathered snow,
Covering the bleak and frozen ground
Whitening the prospect all around.

Chill, chill' is hoary winter's breath
Touching all nature as with death,
Stripping the verdure from the trees,
Causing the waters hard to freeze.

No more, no more the notes are heard
Of babbling brook, or singing bird,
The lakes in icy fetters bound
No more give forth a requiem sound.

Hard, hard! the needy think their lot
Who by the prosperous are forgot;
The widows and the orphans poor
Who begging go from door to door.

Warm, warm now is the rich man's cot,
Though others freeze, he heeds it not;
Of clothes and food an ample store,
Yet nothing giveth to the poor.

Hark, hark! ye who do sumptuous fare
And to the poor give not a share,
The time may come when you will plead,
Then I'll not hear, the Lord hath said.

Come, come, now open wide your door,
Give to the shivering, starving poor;
And for it you will richer be
In time and in eternity.

The Bible's Ordeal.

Remember that there never was a period of research so sifting, of inquiry so unscrupulous, so unprecedented as the last fifty years. Never, if we except the great Reformation upheaval, was there a time when so many shams have exploded, and so many phantoms have been torn to tatters; never have so many hoary prejudices been marched off the stage, and so many time-errors been consigned to obvilion, as within our living day; and betwixt the severe tests of historic accuracy introduced by Niebuhr and the unexpected revelations of antiquity which have rewarded historic enterprise, much that once passed for history is now no more than historic fable. It has been a nervous time for imposture, it has been a noble time for the Bible. Each fresh discovery has been a new leaf to its laurel, a new gem to ts coronet. Lieutenant Lynch floated down the Jordan, and explored the Dead Sea, and his sounding has fetched up from the depths, physical confirmation of the catastrophe which destroyed the cities of the plain. Robinson and Wilson, and Bartlett, and Bonar, have taken pleasure in the dust and rubbish of Zion; and they have back declaring that the Bible is written on every phase of the holy land. Since Larborde opened up the lost Petre, its stones have cried aloud, many a verse of Jehovah's Word stands graven there with a pen of iron on the rock forever. Skepticism was wont to sneer and ask, where is Nineveh, the great city of three days' journey? But since Botta and Layard have shown its sixty miles of enclosed wall, skepticism sneers no longer. Hidden in the sands of Egypt, many of God's witnesses eluded human search till within the last few years; and now, when Bibles increase, and men are running to and fro, through the earth, and when fresh confirmations are timely, God gives the word and there is a resurrection of those witnesses; and from their sphinx-guarded sepulchers, old Pharoahs totter into court, and testify how true was the tale which Moses wrote three thousand years ago; while Nineveh and her long buried monuments, Moab and her long chiselled stones, and the scattered relics and memorials of a long forgotten world, all confirm the statements of the book of God, and tie a millstone around the neck of unbelief, and cast it into the depths of the sea.

"In my youth," said Caviglia, when Lord Lindslay found him in the East, "I read Jean Jaques and Diderot, and believed myself a philosopher. I came to Egypt, and the Scriptures and the pyramids converted me." And even so, a visit to Palestine, the reading of Keith's fulfilment of prophesy, nay, the mere sight of the Assyrian excavations, have given faith to many a doubter, just as I could scarcely imagine any one reading Dr. Stroud on the "Physical Cause of Christ's Death," or Mr. Smith on the "Shipwreck of St. Paul," without the firmest conviction of these historical facts, and consequently, of all these vital truths which the facts by implication involve.

And if during this interval the rampart has been strengthened, the wall itself has risen higher. It is not only the wall of circumvallation which has received fresh facings, as well as vaster blocks into its fabric; but the citadel itself is becoming a taller and more effectual stronghold. The outward confirmations have no doubt been multiplied, but the internal evidence has augmented still more. I do not refer to those minute mutual confirmations which the sagacity of Parley was the first to indicate, and which Blunt, Birks and others have so accurately followed up; but I mean those demonstrations of the Gospel's divinity which have been given on a larger scale in our day than in any age since Pentecost—the individuals and communities among which it has been signalized as the power of God and the wisdom of God unto salvation.—Selected.

How to do Good—An Example.

An English archbishop once said, I have passed through many places of honor and trust, both in church and state, more than any one of my order for seventy years before. But were I assured that by my preaching I had converted one soul to God, I should therein take more comfort than in all the honors and offices that have ever been bestowed upon me."

Compare this humiliating confession of one blessed with such abundant opportunities for doing good with the life of that devoted Christian worker, Harlan Page. Most of his life was spent in a quiet New England community, toiling from day to day at the carpenter's bench, and yet before his death he knew of more than one hundred souls converted by his instrumentality. It is profitable for Christians whose hands must toil for bread, and who find but little leisure away from their homes and business, to inquire the secret of the success of this worker in humble life. We are told that one of his chosen instrumentalities was letter-writing. He was constantly sending earnest and tender missives to those of his acquaintences who were unconverted, and again and again they proved the word in due season.

It is interesting to look over some of these letters preserved by loving hands. Every line reveals the deep sincerity and conviction of soul that prompted them. "I think much of you," he wrote to a relative, "and long to see you in the ark of safety. Have you reason to hope that your sins are pardoned through a Saviour's blood? If not, consider your danger." To another he writes: "You are now in an awful crisis. Your eternal all may depend on the course you take. The Lord has taught you by his Spirit that you are a wretched, perishing sinner. You feel that you have no preparation for heaven, and see nothing before you but eternal woe. O my friend! there is a refuge. The Lord Jesus invites in melting strains, 'Look to me and live? come unto me, and find rest.' Oh! go to him now."

Personal effort was part of the every-day life of Harlan Page. At one time he was working at his trade in a village not many miles distant from his home. The place was without any church or stated preaching, and in the midst of his ordinary cares and toil he found opportunity to converse with each person employed in the factory around which the village had grown up, and also instructed classes, visited families, and distributed tracts. As the result of his labor a church was formed and the services of a pastor secured.

Prayer-meetings were a great help and delight to him in his spiritual life. Not only did they strengthen him for work, but his mind at these times became intensely fixed upon the conversation of impenitent persons, and prayer and effort in their behalf were answered in a wonderful manner. Of one hundred and twenty-five of the Sabbath-school scholars in Coventry, eighty-four gave evidence of piety and six became preachers of the Gospel. Of individuals in the same place with whom he had conversed personally or by letter, thirty adorned the profession of Christ. How blessed and fruitful a life! Its lesson to us becomes the more impressive in view of the fact that it was worked out in the midst of toil and humble surroundings. There is no reason why success like this might not crown our lives, if we possessed the same enthusiasm for Christ, and were as faithful in improving every opportunity to win souls.

Harlan Page made every day tell in the work that held the first thought and place in his heart. To meet a neighbor or friend was an occasion to do them good. To hear of a wanderer was sufficient to arrest his soul in efforts to reclaim and save him. By words, written and spoken, by tracts and consecrated example, in every way, he sought to do good. He had caught the spirit of his Lord and Master, and every action said;

"I must work the works of Him that sent me while it is day; the night cometh, when no man can work."

"The night cometh," let us be faithful. A dying world needs our help. —Working Church.

Ancient Egypt.

Ancient Egypt was the home of a favored race. Its climate is without storms, its soil self-fertilizing, and it is supplied with a watery highway affording unrivaled facilities for commerce. The people obeyed the law of development, and probably attained the condition of civilization before any other nation on earth. The cloudless sky, the dry, warm air and the granite and limestone rocks of Egypt are natural conservators, Inscriptions which were traced thousands of years ago are as fresh and distinct as if carved yesterday.

The death and resurrection of the Egyptian language is one of the most remarkable events of history. It is a broad way opened through a wilderness. In 1799 a French general found a triangular stone at Rosetta, Egypt, bearing a Greek inscription on one side, Hieroglyphics on the second, and an inscription in the Demotic language on the third. The Greek inscription was easily translated by scholars. It was an account of Ptolomy, and asserted that an account of this man had been ordered to be inscribed in the Greek, in the Hieroglyphic and Demotic languages and placed in every temple. In 1815 another stone bearing Greek and Hieroglyphic inscriptions was found giving an account of Cleopatra. The words "Ptolomy" on the first stone, and "Cleopatra" on the second, were enclosed in an ornamented oval and hence were easily distinguished. From these two stones, since the two words contained five letters alike p, t, o, l, e, Champolion was enabled to recover a large part of the Hieroglyphic language. In 1832 he died, but before his death he gave what has been termed an inspired guess, viz., that the Coptic language spoken by priests was a corrupted form of the Hieroglyphic language. This opinion proved correct and contributed much toward the restoration of the Egyptian language.

The best minds of Germany and France turned their attention to this language, and now we have 5,000 words of the Egyptian language. The Canobic stone, older than the Rosetta, has since been found and yielded her treasures to scholars. Mariette, a native of Bologne, has so completely mastered Egyptian history that he can tell in what part of the country and how deep under ground certain records should be found. He goes there and usually finds them. After enduring innumerable annoyances from the government, and excessive fatigues from travel, he has at length won the good will of the government and is now employed by it to take charge of its museum of autiquities, which, in the value and variety of its historical Egyptian relics, although young, already excells any other collection on earth.—Notes of Bayard Taylor's Lecture.

Six Short Hints.

1. Never neglect daily private prayers; and when you pray, remember that God is present, and that he hears your prayers (1 John v. 15.)

2. Never neglect daily Bible reading; and when you read, remember that God is speaking to you; and that you are to believe and act upon what he says. All backsliding begins with the neglect of these two rules (John v. 39.)

3. Never let a day pass without doing something for Jesus. Every morning reflect on what Jesus has done for you and then ask yourself, "What am I doing for him?" (Matt. v. 13-16)

4. If you are ever in doubt as to a thing being right or wrong, go to your room and consider whether you can do it in the name of Jesus, and ask God's blessing on it (1 Cor. iii. 17.) If you cannot do this, it is wrong (Rom. xiv. 23.)

5. Never take your Christianity from Christians, or argue because such and such people do so and so, that, therefore, you may (1 Cor. x. 12.) You are to ask yourself," "How would the Lord have me act?" Follow him (John x. 27.)

6. Never trust your feelings' or the opinions of men, if they contradict God's Word. If authorities are pleaded, still "Let God be true, but every man a liar." (Rom. iii. 4.)

PASTORS, PLEASE READ THIS.—A writer in the Princeton Review of 1830, says: "Ministers have devoted an undue proportion of their labors to those who are grown up, while the young and by far the most hopeful portions of their congregations, have been almost entirely neglected."

Rev. Dr. Ashbel Green, shortly before his death said: "If I had my ministry to go over again, I would give far more attention to the children."

Rev. Dr. Samuel Miller, in his seventy-ninth year, said: "After the observation and experience of a long life, I have come decisively to the conclusion, that if I had my life to live over again, I would pay ten times as much attention to the children of my charge as I ever did when I had a charge. If I were now about to undertake the care of a new or feeble church, I would consider special attention to the children and young people of the neighborhood, as one of the most certain and effectual methods of collecting and strengthening a flock that could possibly be employed."

THE SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.—On looking over the roll of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, curiosity has led us to examine from what stock they sprang. We find that three of them were natives of Ireland—viz., Thorton, Smith, and Taylor, and one, Rutlege, of Irish ancestry; two natives of Scotland, Wilson and Witherspoon, one of Wales, Lewis; and one of England, Robert Morris. There are also three of direct Welsh origin, Williams, Floyd (originally Lloyd), and Lewis Morris; three of Irish, Carroll, Read and McKean; two of Scotch, Hooper and Livingston; one of Swedish, Morton; one of Norman, Bartlett; and one of Austria, Lynch. The others are of old English stock generally, Though there is Welsh blood in the ancestry of John Adams, Jefferson, Clymer, Gwinnett (originally Gwynnedd), and probably Hewett and perhaps Robert Morris was born in Lancastershire, near Wales, and from the name there cannot be much doubt of his Welsh origin. Clymer and his wife, the daughter of Besse Meredith (originally Meredyedd), were both of Welsh origin. The thirteen signers from New England were generally direct decendants from the Puritans.—Boston Commercial Bulletin.

Japanese Characteristics.

Baron de Hubner, the Austrian statesman and diplomat, took a journey of observation round the world three years ago, and tells the world in a history of his travels, the following concerning a people of whom all wish to know more:

"The Japanese are wonderful lovers of nature. In Europe a feeling for beauty has to be developed by education. With the Japanese laborer the sense of beauty is innate. Perhaps, also he has more time to cultivate it. He is not so overworked as our English or German laborers. The fertility of the soil, the soft rains, the warm sun, do half the business. There are many hours when he can rest, lying on his mat at his cabin door, smoking his pipe, and listening to the songs of his daughters, while his eyes are feasting on the beautiful scenery around him, which he thoroughly enjoys. If he can, he builds his house on the banks of a stream; with a few big stones placed in the necessary spot, he makes a little waterfall, for he loves the sound of rushing water. At the side of his hut grows a little cedar. He separates some of the branches, and make them bend over the roof, both for shade and beauty. This is a subject you see thousands of times depicted in illuminated Japanese drawings. On the other side, he plants an apricot tree—when it is in flower, the man and his family are in ecstacy. This extraordinary love and feeling for nature is reflected in all Japanese productions. A taste for the fine arts is common among the very lowest classes, and to a degree which is not found in any country in Europe. In the humblest cottage you will find traces of this—an artificial flower, an ingenious child's toy, an incense-burner, an idol, heaps of little ornamental things, the only use of which is to give pleasure to the eye. With us, except in the service of religion, this kind of art is the privilege of the rich and of people in easy circumstances. In Japan it is every one's property; and if a man be too poor to ornament his hut with a picture representing the snowy cone of Fujiyama, with a fine pear-tree in full flower in the foreground; or with a statue of a singer sitting on a death's head; or with a drawing of a bird mounting up to the sky; or of a butterfly settling on a rainbow; or of a beetle casting amorous glances on a turtle, who turns away his head in disdain—if, as I say, he is too poor to indulge in one or other of these favorite subjects, well he will console himself by looking, with a artistic eye, at the mountains near his house, at his apricot tree in flower, or at his little cedar; and he will listen with delight to the music of his cascade, and expect you to be delighted too."

Morning Prayer.

The morning bright,
With rosy light,
Has waked me from my sleep;
Father, I own
Thy love alone
Thy little one doth keep.

All through the day,
I humbly pray,
Be thou my guard and guide,
My sins forgive,
And let me live,
Blest Jesus, near thy side.

O, make thy rest
Within my breast,
Great Spirit of all grace!
Make me like thee,
Then I shall be Prepared to see thy face.

A Letter from the Grasshopper Region to an Infant Class.

BEAVER CREEK, Minn.

DEAR FRIENDS:—A few days ago a letter came to me from ——— stating that you had paid for the Christian Cynosure for me, and also that you wished me to write you a letter of acknowledgement and tell you something about grasshoppers, etc. I would be glad if I was able to make my letter interesting to you. The present you send me I prize very much; more than its money value.

When I was a very little boy I became a member of the Sabbath-school and almost all the time since (with the exception of over two years of war). I have been a member, either as scholar or teacher, and I expect to be as long as I live. . . . . But I must now tell you something of those great pests of our western farmers, the grasshoppers. Each one of you little children have seen the common grasshopper that jumps around in the grass in the summer time. These are called "natives." But those which eat up our crops are called "emigrants," because they fly from one place to another.

Children, what would you think if you should go out into your father's fields in the morning in the summer, with the sun shining brightly; the wheat, oats and corn looking nicely and almost ripe enough to cut,—you would not believe that grasshoppers could come in such great numbers as to eat everything up before night, not leaving enough for you to tell in the morning what grew on the ground.

They do not commence to fly until 9 or 10 o'clock in the morning. They get thicker as it grows later in the day until by 2 or 3 o'clock the sky as far as you can see toward the sun will be a living, flying mass. If they settle down in the grain, they break the cornstalks down and bend the wheat and oats to the ground. Everything soon seems to be alive with them. They cut the wheat off just below the head and let it drop on the ground. They are not fond of wheat so they do not eat that much; but they eat the oats more readily, besides shelling off the kernels badly. They love the corn for its sweet juice is very nice to their taste. They will bite away at a stalk until it falls to the ground and then hundreds will crawl upon it and eat it greedily. After they once alight on our grain we only hope for a good strong north wind which pleases them remarkably well. If they have got enough to eat, they will arise in armies or clouds and fly towards the south; if there is anything left of the grain we are rejoiced, of course, and if it is all gone it makes the poor farmer who has worked hard feel sad. The noise they make in the grain where they eat is something like fine hail on the window glass. It rattles and spatters awfully. When they are flying they make a low buzzing sound, something like a strong wind heard at a distance from you. They look when in the air very much as the snow does when it can be seen passing before the wind in large flakes, only they are more plenty when they are at the thickest.

Among the things they love most is the onion, cabbage, radish and pie-plant. These garden vegetables are strong and they will eat these before they touch beans, peas or beets. But if they stay until their choice is all gone, they take the next best.

Now I have written all I can think of that would interest you about grasshoppers; if there is more that you would like to hear about, you may ask your teacher to make it known to me and I will gladly answer any questions she or you may ask.

Children, you must accept my thanks for your pennies and I hope God will reward you. Be good, love and obey your parents, for it is pleasing unto the Lord. I will remember you as long as I live. G. H. H.

A CLEAN APRON.—A lady wanted a trusty little maid to come and help her take charge of a baby. Nobody could recommend one, and she hardly knew where to look for the right kind of a girl. One day she was passing through a by-lane and saw a little girl with a clean apron holding a baby in the doorway of a small house. "That is the maid for me," said the lady. She stopped and asked for her mother. "Mother has gone out to work," answered the girl. "Father is dead, and now mother has to do everything." "Should yon not like to come and live with me?" asked the lady. I should like to help mother somehow," said the little maid. The lady, more pleased than ever with the tidy looks of the little girl, went to see her mother after she came home, and the end of it was that the lady took the maid to live with her, and she found—what indeed she expected to find—that the neat appearance of her person showed the neat and orderly bent of her mind. She had no careless habits, she was no friend to dirt, but everything she had to do with was folded up and put away, and kept carefully. The lady finds great comfort in her and helps her mother, whose lot is not now so hard as it was. She smiles when she says, "Sally's recommendation was her clean apron;" and who will say that it was not a good one.

Think upon sin, and repent; think upon God, and return; think upon grace, and hope; upon glory, and press forward.

sexes in co-education is healthful and benign. A word of reproof, however mild, spoken to either sex in presence of the other, is more influential over each than censure or expulsion, even in colleges where but one sex is present. In Knox College, with a catalogue of from 300 to 500 in eleven years, I had but a single faculty case.

5. The stimulus to study which the sexes afford each other, is stronger and better than that of prizes, because more natural. Neither wishes to be inferior to the other; yet their competition is not soured by envy and the desire to be beat, but sweetened by the strongest possible desire to be on good terms with each other.

The argument might be continued, but the burden of proof belongs properly to the other side.

But, one says, is the argument against co-education drawn from health nothing? Can the delicate brain of woman stand the hard intellectual drill? Must we not mince our steps in the curriculum, and so spoil the race, that our feebler sisters may keep up?

The answer is, the clumsiest bird though the strongest, may not fly farthest or highest, but the bird that has the quickest wing. It is, however, true that the rage for intellectual culture, the vain ambition of large institutions to excel small ones by the impossible pretense of imparting more learning in the same time, and the hot-bed stimulus of "prizes for suicide" may, and do actually lead to cramming processes which are fatal to health; but they destroy the health of male and female alike. The College Courant, speaking of a pale-faced row of prize-winners in Boston, forcibly says: "They each had won a medal and lost what was of more value than all the gold medals ever struck," viz., robust health, And the Courant adds, "The practical world has ceased to expect much of valedictorians and prize-medal bearers." He is speaking of boys, not girls. And to argue that young women cannot endure hard study as well as young men, is to ignore the fact that God has fitted women, more than men, for sedentary life. And to exclude women from co-education on the plea that it will injure their health, is to make them scape-goats to bear into the desert of mental inferiority the sins of a college system which stuffs the intellect and starves the conscience, and which parades enormous requirements which are seldom lived up to, and ought not to be if they are.

But will not co-education make our daughters boyish, brawny, and hard-fibred?

No. Hume tells us that Lady Jane Gray was "of an amiable person, engaging disposition, and accomplished parts." Her feminine sweetness and gentleness still wins the hearts of all who read her history. Yet the author tells us "she had received all her education with Edward the VI., and seemed even to possess greater facility in acquiring every part of manly and polite literature." And she wrote a sentence in Greek, Latin, and English, on seeing her husband taken to execution by her window. No! her "manly" education, co-education even, no more detracts from the loveliness of woman, than the sunlight which strenghens the corn injures the delicacy of the flowers.

How, then, are we to account for the almost universal prejudice which once existed, and which still lingers in Europe and America against the co-education of sexes in colleges?

I answer: The separation of the sexes is a device of idolatrous society, and idolatry is the most popular institution on the globe. Why should not the convent college be popular? It has come to us from the Middle Ages when worshiped woman, and then left her to starve, beg, or drudge. And though the progress of democracy and sound sense has driven the knight-errant to the plow and his lady-love to her loom, still thousands would prefer the hope of being idols to the certainty of being good women. Thus the cloister-colleges, like their prototypes, the convent and nunnery, are popular as lotteries, which, though they beggar the many to enrich the few, yet dazzle the eyes of all with the hope of wealth. Thus the colleges excluding women, and the seminaries excluding men, originally the education of privileged classes and castes, still retain a tinge from the complexion of their origin, and they are popular for the reasons which lead Americans to visit Rome, clergymen, statesmen, and others to worship the Pope, that is, for the aristocrary and privileged orders which they are supposed to represent.

"Gaily the troubadour

In co-education young men and women meet and mingle as brothers and sisters in the family, confronted with the realities of life and surrounded by circumstances and by equals which reveal the first outbreak of folly, and even the first hidden tendencies to evil. By constant comparison and acquaintance. girls become good judges of the qualities and motives of their lovers, and vice versa of the young men. And vice is thus shorn of half its power by being stripped of its magic, there being no temptation, as at Vassar, to climb out of a window for a run-away match.

Where Christ and Christianity are uppermost in an institution, the sexes may be kept pure in each other's society, and nowhere else. For whatever brings human beings together in masses, if it does not purify, corrupts them. And the various devices for separating the sexes, whether in pagan lands or Christian, as harems, seraglios, houses of monks and nuns, and unmixed colleges and seminaries, are but so many attempts to cure, regulate, or repress the evils of a fallen nature, by caging young men and women apart. It is needless in the face of history to say that these attempts to keep men and women pure by keeping them apart have always aggravated the evils they were meant to cure. For, while the Puritan academies and Quaker meetings of Christian Europe have demonstrated the possibility of keeping the sexes at once united and yet pure, there is no purity in pagan lands, nor in Christian lands where the sexes are separated by stone walls.

In this view of our theme, the co-education of the sexes derives a solemn dignity and importance from its relation to the regeneration of society and the deliverance of our race from despotism, sin, and misery. Co-education is God's modern movement against the infallible papacy and the celibacy of priests. It is but too obvious that the co-education of the sexes must be impossible to priests. If a swarm of young ecclesiastics, under a life-long vow to abjure Christ's institution of marriage, were to be educated in mixed institutions with an equal number of innocent and affectionate girls, the wicked absurdity of the celibate, "forbidding to marry," would lead either to consecrated prostitution or abdication of the priesthood. Indeed, priestism cannot live and breath in democratic society, where the sexes have equal rights. Itself being a caste, and the most vicious of all castes, it can only live by casting society in its own mould. The priest must be permitted to put the Bible out of the school, and Christ and marriage, and the hope of marriage along with it. Then the only hope of purity will be in shutting the sexes apart; and the word of a priest being substituted for the word of God, the only power remaining to regulate society will be the power of priesthood backed by the civil arm. And this is paganism or worse.

The co-education of the sexes is to us a star of hope preceding the dawn. Bismarck, and Gladstone, and Disraeli may assail Ultramontanism, as they are doing, in the interests of humanity and in obedience to God. But while the Jesuits have their human cages of janizaries, priests and nuns, permeating society like the fabled ghosts and spirits of the Dark Ages, statesmen have more to fear from the ideas of the people than from the conspiracies of priests. But if the teachers of America, taught themselves by the great teacher, Christ, shall be his true apostles, commissioned to "teach the nations," by his dying words; if, by co-education, they reflect that glorious system in which there is "neither male nor female, barbarian or Scythian;" if they abjure all ritualism, as the general antagonist of truth, though Europe may be in death-grapple with Ultramontanism, our own Republic shall stand, and the future of our beloved country, like the galaxy of the firmament, shall be a pathway paved with suns.

Religious Intelligence.

—The American Missionary Association is incumbered with a debt of $79,000 and needs for the next ten months $205,000, or 63 cents from each member of the Congregational churches of the country. The work of this society is great and pressing; it should not be allowed to suffer.

—Rev. J. F. Ellis, a graduate of Wheaton College and Oberlin Theological Seminary, sailed Dec. 5th from New York for Oregon, via Panama and San Francisco. He left the Congregational church in East Toledo on an urgent call from Oregon.

—The week of prayer is quite generally observed by the churches of Chicago. The prayer meeting room in the new Farwell Hall building, occupying the same place as before the fire, was opened on Monday. A large attendance and earnest spirit marked the meeting. Twelve persons rose for prayers.

—The Woman's Temperance Union held an all-day prayer meeting in the same room, on Monday for a blessing on their great work.

—The Philadelphia Ministers' Union at its quarterly meeting, Dec. 28th, discussed the propriety of Sabbath funerals, and the opening of the Zoological Gardens on the Lord's day.

—The Ministerial Union of Chicago have recommended to the churches and individual Christians of the city that Friday of this week be observed as a day of fasting and prayer to God for the outpouring of the spirit upon this city and a general awakening in all of our churches. An all-day meeting will be held in Farwell Hall, commencing at 9 o'clock, and closing at 4 o'clock. The following programme of exercises will be followed: Responsibility of Christians for salvation of men; reasons for the churches' lack of success in saving souls; conditions in God's Word for the revival of the church; supplication for individual requests; relations of the Holy Spirit to the power of the church; special reasons for expecting and laboring to secure a general revival in our city; consecration.

—On the recent visit of King Kalakaua to Chicago, a reporter of the Tribune reiterated the slander, of so long standing among the enemies of Christianity, that the population of the Sandwich Islands was dying out through the influence and policy of the missionaries. He makes Kapena, one of the escort, say that this was the result of missionary effort in pursuading the people to forsake their savagery and to put on clothes instead of going naked. "It is somewhat remarkable, that wherever the missionaries came—I will except the Roman Catholics—depopulation followed." A brief extract from Nordhoff's "Northern California, Oregon and the Sandwich Islands" is a sufficient answer to the slander: "Their patient and effective labors seem to me, now that I have seen the results, to have been singularly undervalued at home. No intelligent American can visit the islands and remain there even a month without feeling proud that the civilization which has here been created in so marvelously short a time was the work of his country men and women; and if you make the acquaintance of the older missionary families you will not leave them without deep personal esteem for their characters, as well as admiration of their work. They did not only form a written language for the Hawaiian race, and painfully write for them schoolbooks, a dictionary, and a translation of the Scriptures and of a hymn-book; they did not merely gather the people in churches and their children into schools; but they guided the race, slowly and with immense difficulty, toward Christian civilization; and though the Hawaiian is no more a perfect Christian than the New Yorker or Massachusetts man, and though there are still traces of old customs and superstitions, these missionaries have eradicated the grosser crimes of murder and theft so completely, that even in Honolulu people leave their houses open all day and unlocked all night, without thought of theft; and there is not a country in the world where the stranger may travel in such absolute safety as in these islands."

News of the Week.

The City.

A State Association of Fruit Growers was organized here this week. The attendance was about 150.——A series of Gospel meetings are being held by the various churches in the West Division. They have united in asking Major Whittle to conduct morning prayer meetings, and afternoon Bible reading and preach in the evening Evening meetings will be held through the week of prayer in the following churches: First Congregational, Third Pres, Union Park Cong., Second Baptist, Centennary M. E. and Ada St. M. E; next week in the First Cong. every evening but Saturday.——Frederick Douglass lectured on Tuesday evening on John Brown.

The Country.

The estate of J. Fisk, Jr., is at length found to be all gone, divided among lawyers, legislators and harlots. Although he amassed great wealth from the Erie railroad and other business it was spent upon his lusts and for bribes as fast as he made it.——The grasshopper sufferers in Minnesota are again asking for aid. In Kansas and Nebraska, provision for the present emergency is distributed or on the way. Seed for another crop must be furnished.——A rich vein of silver, lead and gold is reported in Essex Co., Mass. It is said to yield more than the famous lodes of Nebraska.——Capt. E. B. Ward, of Detroit, fell dead of apoplexy in the street last week. He had vast interests in iron works in the West and in the Michigan lumber region. His estate is worth over $10,000,000.

The South.

The Congressional Committee which has been sitting in New Orleans, found its work interrupted on Monday and their lives in danger. The Democratic part of the legislature attempted to steal a march on their opponents who were slightly in the majority. They almost forcibly placed one of their number in the chair and pretended to begin business. After protesting and shouting knives and revolvers were drawn and a bloody fight was imminent. The Democrats finally appealed to the U. S. troops who came in and cleared the lobby. The business was then begun in a lawful manner when the Democrats again began a fearful uproar and finally left the hall. Those who remained formed a quorum and organized properly. Gen. Sheridan has assumed command, and the State House, with the Republican members in it, are under guard. But for the prompt action of the U. S. authorities, a bloody affray would have occurred.

Foreign.

—Prince Alphonso, illegitimate son of Queen Isabella, who has made feeble claim to a throne in Spain, has been declared King without any revolutionary measures. Don Carlos will now give up a wanton struggle, for the Pope has blessed Alphonso, and all the opponents of the Republic are Catholics.

—A London dispatch says that the heavy rise in the price of coal, consequent on the strikes, is causing much distress among the poor in England. Prices have been advanced from fifteen to twenty per cent., and are expected to go still higher.

—The sentence in the Von Arnim trial having been published in Vienna several hours before it was pronounced, a disciplinary inquiry has been instituted against Judge Reich, who was President of the court before which the Count was tried, with a view to ascertaining the author of the breach of secrecy.

—Late accounts from Asia Minor show that the distress from the famine is increasing. There is much disease, and many deaths occur daily.

—Her Majesty's ship Basilisk has just returned to England after a commission of nearly four years, and brings word that a large archipelago of islands has been discovered in the neighborhood of New Guinea, and that two mountains in this region, each about 11,000 feet high, have been named Mount Gladstone and Mount Disraeli.

Home and Health Hints.

THE CARE OF OIL-CLOTHS.—An oil-cloth requires careful treatment, and should never be scrubbed with a brush, but after first being swept with the long-handled hair brushes that are made for the purpose, it should be carefully washed with a large, soft cloth dipped into milk and water—half and half; or, if the milk is not attainable, tepid water without soap. The latter ruins oil-cloth by taking off the brightness of the paint, and it should never be applied. Hot water is also very injurious to it; either of them—soap or hot water—being sure to injure the oil-cloth more than the wear of it. When washed over, wipe it off with a soft, dry cloth, and it will always retain a bright look. In purchasing an oil-cloth, it is very desirable to obtain one that has been made for several years, as the longer it has lain unwashed the better it will wear—the print becoming harder and more durable. An oil-cloth made within the year is hardly worth buying, as the paint will be defaced in a short time.

CRACKS IN STOVES, ETC.—Good wood ashes are to be sifted through a fine sieve; to them is to be added an equal quantity of clay, finely pulverized, together with a little salt. The mixture is to be moistened with water enough to make a paste, and the crack of the stove filled with it. The cement does not peel off or break away, and assumes an extreme degree of hardness after being heated. The stove must be cool when the application is made. The same substance may be used in setting in the plates of a stove, or in fitting stove pipes, serving to render all the joints perfectly tight.

—Keep your canned fruit in a room where it does not freeze; but do not keep it so warm that it will ferment.

—A solution of oxalic acid crystals, one part by measure to eight of soft water, will entirely remove dry ink stains. Samples of mixed and of woolen goods are sent by the author of this recipe from which ink stains have been removed by this acid, leaving scarce a trace behind.

—Many people like onions, but dislike to eat them because of the bad taste that remains in the mouth. This can be remedied by boiling the sliced onions in a half gallon of water for the space of a minute or two. Pour it off, add pepper, salt, and butter, and when dished, a few spoonfuls of sweet cream. No taste of onions will remain in the mouth, nor can it be detected on the breath.

GERMAN CURE FOR NEURALGIA.—Macerate the leaves of the common field thistle and use it as a poultice on the parts affected. Make a tea of the leaves, boil it down till quite strong and drink a glass of it before each meal. This remedy, it is said, invariably gives relief, and will in a short time cure the disease.

BUCKWHEAT CAKES.—If you want buckwheat cakes at a moment's warning, mix in a large stone or earthen pot When you take out quantum sufficit for breakfast or supper, mix as much in another vessel as you take out, and pour it into the large pot, stirring it well. By observing this rule you will always have nice light cakes. The large pot must be kept in the cellar.—H., in Ger. Tel.

Farm and Garden.

Why Don't the Hens Lay.

During the chilly weather of late autumn, and amid the pelting storms and rigors of our northern winters, everything is adverse to the production of eggs. During the latter part of the growing season, and the former part of the winter, hens are moulting. During this process (or disease as some poulterers term moulting) fowls seldom lay eggs, even when all their surroundings favor the production of eggs. In most instances, the apartments of fowls are too uncomfortably cold. After your hens have retired to their roosts for a cold night thrust your fingers among their feathers and observe how they all shiver with the cold. Hens will not produce eggs unless they can be kept comfortably warm, especially during the long and cold nights of winter. Another reason why hens will not lay eggs in cold weather is, they are supplied with a deficiency of suitable food and drink at the proper time. For example, your fowls are fed generously with hard grain late in the afternoon. After the lapse of a few hours, the dry grain has absorbed every drop of water in their crops. The birds will then be in an uneasy, restless, and feverish condition. Perhaps ten or twelve hours must elapse before the suffering creatures can have access to water. When the morning does dawn their fountain of water is frozen up, perhaps, or they must eat snow, or their owner has failed to provide a supply of the luscious beverage. Hence derangement of the hen's egg-producing functions is sure to follow such treatment, so that the abundant secretion in the ovarium will be entirely arrested. By injudicious management hens often become so dyspeptic that they cannot macerate and digest a sufficient quantity of grain in the course of a week to form an egg. The range of many flocks is often where they cannot find a single grain of coarse sand or fine gravel. Consequently a large portion of their food must pass through the gizzard without being crushed. Hence it will not be digested. Every domestic fowl and the birds of the air are provided with miniature grist-mills in the form of gravel stones within the gizzard for the purpose of crushing the hard pieces of grain. The gravel stones soon pass away and the birds must have others, or they cannot macerate their rough food. Thousands of poulterers never think it necessary to provide gravel for their hens. Then, as the birds fail to produce eggs, they administer a dose of pepper and other obnoxious condiments. When an editor is weary and hungry, it would just be as sensible to supply him with a dry crust of stale bread blackened with pepper to enable him to write something spicy, witty, or useful as to feed a dyspeptic hen food liberally peppered for the purpose of superintending a laying habit. A laying hen is a little laboratory. Eggs are composed largely of albumen and water. If all the conditions are not exactly right for extracting the albumen from their feed an egg cannot be produced. An analytical chemist cannot perform certain experiments without just such a degree of heat and certain materials, and the proper condition and quantity. Neither can a hen lay eggs unless she has a generous supply of feed and water at the desired moment in addition to a proper degree of heat. In order to induce hens to lay eggs in cold weather all the foregoing suggestions must be heeded, the wrong things should be avoided, and the right things must be done at the proper time. The writer's hens—except those that are now moulting—have layed eggs every day all the fall, and they continue to roll out the eggs the 18th of December.—N. Y. Herald.

Temperance.

The Woman's Temperance Union of Chicago.

On the 30th, this Society issued an appeal, through the daily papers, to "Chicago matrons and maidens," that the wine glass be banished from the refreshment tables on New Year's day; as thus, "during the merry hours of Jan. 1, 1875, you may, almost without effort, achieve more for the young men and public sentiment of our city than we can accomplish by a whole year of arduous toil."

Also, that when opportunity offered a kind word should be spoken which might lead "somebody's son" into a better path.

In this address was the first public announcement of the fact that "the autograph pledge-book open on the parlor table will replace the wine glass in many a home, this year, in the land of the woman's crusade."

Representative members of the Union received New Year's calls from those "interested in the work or inclined to sign the pledge," at their headquarters, room 3, 148 Madison street (entrance to Farwell Hall). This room is kindly given them by the Y. M. C. A., and has been furnished with carpet, chairs, etc., by some of our leading business men.

Miss Willard's business hour has been changed from eleven A. M. to two P. M.; and from three to four P. M. The ladies hold a daily temperance prayer-meeting, to which the public is invited—especially those who sell intoxicating drinks, or who suffer from their use. Ladies who are down town shopping, and others, will find it convenient to drop in during the hour of prayer.

Jan. 4th was observed as a day of fasting and prayer for the overthrow of intemperance, our greatest "national sin." Reported by How a Clergyman was Ruined by Rum.

The Rev. J. J. Talbott, once an Episcopal clergyman, then a victim of intemperance, and expelled from his diocese, but now reformed, lectured at Terre Haute, Ind., sometime since. The following is an extract from his address:

Though the words choke me, I am here to-night to say that every experiment of my life is that wine is a mocker, and that nothing is proof against the seductive siren. The mightiest and greatest intellects of the world are blasted by her strategems. It found me in the ranks of those who press to battle for the right. I stood up nobly and freely, and my soul knew no burden. But the destroyer came, clothed in the splendor of the sunlight —in beauty that bewildered my senses and polluted my soul.

But you ask me how this ruin was wrought. First, by prescribed stimulants. Then, in the infernal delusion that moderate drinking was beneficial, came the habit of drinking wine at joyous occasions. I kept on; I fell; I laid aside the habiliments of Him who did only good, and wandered forth at the bidding of my own spell bound will. I tell you, once put on the chains of strong drink, and you may flee to the uttermost parts of the earth, as I did, and the anger of God will follow you. I came home after years of wandering. At last the demon of delirium seized me, and the serpent of the still feasted on my quivering flesh.

For five days and nights I lay at the gates of hell. But He was pleased to drag me forth from the presence of the ghosts with whom I held such awful converse. I can now survey the field and measure the losses. The prime of my life is wasted. I had high office and an unspotted character. This demon of wine dragged me down, and the drunkard's life was mine. I had means, but my riches fled. I had a beautiful home, but the demon entered, and the light faded from its halls. I had beautiful children, but this monster took their dimpled hands in his, and led them to the grave.

I had a wife whom to know was to love. To-night she sits in misery, while I wander reckless over the earth. I had a mother whose chief pride was my life, but the thunder-bolt struck her too. Years of work in the cause of the right may give back to these arms my loving wife. But, oh! what joy when I clasp in another world the hand of my mother. And thus I stood, and thus I stand to-day, a husband without a wife, a father without a child —all swallowed up in the fearful maelstrom of drink.

I stand with scarce a friend on earth. Oh, drink of that bitter cup, and then ask me if I can paint in too high colors the picture of my despair—ask me if I hate the agent of my ruin. Hate it! I hate the whole damning traffic. I would to God that every distillery in this nation were in flames. I would write on the glowing sky in letters black as their smoke: Woe, woe to him that putteth the bottle to his neighbor's lips.

The Wine at Cana.

It was oinos that Jesus made. What kind of oinos? Fermented, of course, say the alcoholists. Let us assume that they are right; that our Lord made a hundred and twenty-six gallons of intoxicating wines for a company already much inebriated. For if the governor of the feast meant merely to speak of what was sometimes customary at feasts, and not to describe the actual condition of the guests then present, the article was much weakened for the wine-bibbers. They were oinosed (wined), methusthosi (drunk, "well drunk"), when Christ came upon the scene. He is notified that the bibulous company have swallowed all the wine provided for the feast. If the interpretation of the alcoholists is to hold, there can be no irreverence in assuming that his thoughts and words ran thus: "This will never do. They are pretty drunk already, but the revelry must go on, and shall have alcoholic wine to their fill. Fill up the water-pots. There, I have made six big water-pots full; and if that is not enough to keep up the delirium and fun, let me know, and they shall have six times as much more. So will I manifest forth my glory." I join the reader in the opinion that such a view is horrible and blasphemous. But it is a legitimate and inevitable conclusion from the premises laid down by the advocates of alcoholic wine. If our Lord made an intoxicating beverage at Cana, he made it for a company already quite inebriated, and set the the seal and sanction of his first miracle upon drunkenness in all its stages, and throughout all ages. Abandon the wretched interpretation—as drunken and impious as the scene which it compels the fancy to portray—and the miracle becomes a thing of benediction and bounty for the faith and cheer of all the generations of our race."—Ex.

The Baptist Union makes a good point against the defenders of the liquor business. It says: Liquor sellers use curious arguments. Because the liquor business consumes half the rye, corn and barley, in the country, intemperance should be encouraged. Because liquor sellers pay $90,000,000 of taxes they should be encouraged. Because 8,910,823 barrels of beer are drank in the country, it is right and a blessing. Because the business employs 2,000,000 of men and women, it is to be commended! On the same principle, because crime gives employment to thousands of lawyers, policemen, jailors, locksmiths and executioners, it should be fostered. What a terrible calamity it would be if all men should become Christians! What armies of officials would be thrown out of employment? What should we do with our jails, prisons, and poor houses, gambling houses and dens of vice? Would it not be terrible?

That the book is one of great interest and value is shown by tho following

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whoso statements seem to be worthy of full credenee. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hnndred pages just issned by him, pnrporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationalist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—'The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscenees of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The anthor belonged to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughont the conntry forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's mnrderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The anthor opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a seusation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is supposed by many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acqnainted with Mr. Greene, and havo no donbt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y., and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—'Tho Storm Gathering;" "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

Our Subscription List.

The whole number of our subscribers is 4,080. Exchanges, fifty-nine. Total, 4,139. This account shows how our subscription list stands December 31st, 1874.

We will mention the States according to the number of subscribers in their order. Illinois holds the first place with 797 subscribers. Will you not make the number at least 1,000 by next January? Ohio as usual has the second place. Indiana occupies the third place. New York continues to occupy the fourth place. We think the Empire State owes a better support to the Cynosure (if for no other reason) for the sake of the memory of Wm. Morgan. Please go up higher. Iowa holds the fifth place. She deserves a State agent we think. Pennsylvania the sixth. Michigan occupies the seventh place. These States occupied the same relative positions three months ago. We hope they will maintain a generous rivalry in extending the circulation of the Cynosure this year, and rejoice in abundant success. Missourioccupies the eighth place, exchanging her former position with Wisconsin, which takes the ninth. Vermont continues to hold the tenth place; Kansas, the eleventh; Massachusetts, the twelfth; Minnesota, the thirteenth place; Oregon, the fourteenth. Connecticut has left the seventeenth place within the last three months and come up into the fifteenth. This change is the result of prayerful, persevering effort. Is she going higher? California holds the sixteenth place. Washington Territory the seventeenth. Maine has come up one step within three months and is now number eighteen. New Jersey has come up into the nineteenth place. Ontario (Canada) takes the twentieth. Virginia occupies the twenty-first. Nebraska, the twenty-second. Colorado, the twenty-third. Georgia, the twenty-fourth, and New Hampshire the twenty-fifth place. If we could see as Christ saw when he said of the widow's two mites, we would perhaps have placed the States differently. Certainly the State which is most in dilligent and prayerful labors to promote the kingdom of Christ and its righteousness, deserves the highest place.

We thank all our subscribers for their prayers and ask their continuance. We thank you for the efforts you have made during the past year for the support of the paper, and for your appreciation of our efforts to make it more valuable. We ask that you may be able to do even more for the advancement of our GREAT cause and the prosperity of the Cynosure this year than last, and assure you that it will be our pleasure, our duty and our endeavor to make the Cynosure a greater power against those forces which are operating in our land to undermine and destroy religion and republican institutions this year than ever it has been before. May you all, abiding in Christ, enjoy a HAPPY NEW YEAR.

Publishers.

—We receive so many letters at this season of the year that we are compelled to delay the publ cation of many kind words and good thoughts, and we are compelled to omit many altogether which we should be g'ad to present to our readers if it was convenient to do so.

Postage on the Cynosure.

The cost of postage now depends entirely on the size and weight, and therefore some smaller papers charge but fifteen cents; and others about the size of the Cynosure charge twenty-five cents a year for postage.

THE POSTAGE ON THE CYNOSURE MUST BE PAID AT CHICAGO. It is twenty cents a year.

If the subscription price of the CYNOSURE was $2.50 or $3.00 a year, the price of many religious papers containing no more reading matter, we might afford to pay the postage ourselves, but at $2.00 year a we cannot do this.

Therefore let all send the postage, 20 cents a year, 10 cents for half a year with their renewals.

The commission on one new subscription for a year will pay the postage on your own and the new subscriber's paper. We would rather have the postage paid by commissions than in any other way.

When postage is not paid we shall have to shorten the time of subscription sufficiently to pay it.

TERMS FOR THE CYNOSURE.

All responsible persons who desire to promote this reform are authorized to act as agents.

Topics of the Time.

The record of the late Gerrit Smith has been widely noticed in the anti-slavery and temperance issues; but as one who loved his fellow-men and strove to save them from the thraldom of the lodge the press is nearly silent. Like William H Seward, Thaddeus Stevens, Thurlow Weed. Horace Greeley, and other names of strength in our history, Mr. Smith's political record begun near the Morgan abduction and was developed in the struggle that followed. In 1824 he attended a political convention of which Weed was a member, and made his first considerable speech. He entered heartily into the Anti-masonic movement and lent it great moral and social force. In 1828 he was a member of the State convention which supported John Quincy Adams, and prepared its address to the people. In 1830 he was nominated State Senator on the anti-lodge ticket, but was beaten. He soon after gave himself to the study of law rendered necessary by his vast real estate business. But his hostility to secret societies was as enduring as his friendship for the slave, and the first State Assotion of New York found in him a hearty and active sympathizer. He was its first president, and contributed annually to the funds and literature of the reform.

The State of Illinois once had in her statutes a code known as the "Black Laws" which were drawn for the benefit of the white man and against the negro. The hard service of war which was thought to have rubbed out the distinctions of color, at least scratched off these partial statutes years ago. But the ultra wing of the Democracy, flushed with success, are working for their restoration. They have begun with the public school, the lowest stone in our social structure which politicians can tamper with; and they wish first to introduce a course of instruction in ethnology and the beauties of caste by legislating on white and black skins, which latter they propose, by a bill already presented, to put by themselves. The State of Indiana, deaf to the lessons of Providence, has all along held to this legislation of caste and a few weeks since her Supreme Court decided that black children might be excluded by law from white schools. And to the eternal shame of the State the infamous law was actually enforced in a little town in Clay county and twenty-five children turned out of the public school. In New Orleans, though the school law recognizes no race distinctions, the white students of the Boy's High School drove the colored boys from the building, and completed the work by marching to the Girl's School to force a similar ejection with threats of violence. It is needless to remark on such transactions. If human rights are to be perpetually ignored; if we fly in the face of the Almighty and defy his providences; if we refuse to recognize Christ in the person of His poor, but sell him "for a piece of bread," what need we look for but vengeance?

Mr. Judson Graves, a disciple of Robert Ingersoll, and editor of an obscure local journal, the Galesburg Plaindealer, has started an issue we sincerely hope he will push a little. The visit of the evangelist, E. P. Hammond, to Galesburg, Ill., a few weeks since, was heralded through the tin trumpet of the Plaindealer, and from a certain Universalist pulpit as a fraud in the name of religion. A significant silence was brought upon these slanderers by the manifest success of Mr. Hammond's labors which was witnessed by rejoicing souls on every side, and by the evangelical pastors of the city in a body. Rev. M. L. Williston, in placing these facts before the public, has drawn the fire of said Graves, who, in a long tirade in the Chicago Tribune, brings forward the terrible charge that he "pointedly refused" to read a Masonic prayer at the funeral of a railroad conductor conducted by the lodge; and to aggravate the offense, the clergyman, while conducting the exercises, though the presence of a hundred Freemasons plead for some word of recognition, did treat them and the fact of the Masonic connection of the dead with "studied neglect." If now the lodge will follow up this line of attack on sincere and conscientious men, let them beat their drums, spread their aprons, draw their compass and square, and shoulder their setting-maul. Welcome to the combat! If the good character of ministers of the Gospel depends on the amount of flattery bestowed upon the lodge, they will by thousands resign what character they have, and begin to hammer out anew on a better basis. Mr. Graves has taken the true Masonic position against the Christian ministry. When his lodge-fellows all occupy his ground the issue will be fairly presented, Christianity against the lodge.

Song for the Times.

As sung with great applause by GEO. W. CLARK, at the Annual meeting of the "N. Y., Christian Association Opposed to Secret Societies," held at Lockport, N. Y., Dec. 22, 23 and 24, 1874.

From my "Home on the Hill-side" I list to the din
That rolls o'er the valleys from the conflict with sin;
And to aid in this struggle now raging for Right,
I come in truth's armor to join in the fight!

Tho' my day is far spent and the night draweth nigh,
Yet my heart swells for Freedom, my trust is on high;
Tho' my arm may be weak by the side of the strong,
I may cheer on the brave with the voice of my song.

Sons of Freedom the bondage of Slavery abhor,
And millions set free in the "Slavocrats" war;
So true manhood all "cabals" and their fetters disdains,
And will throw off the yoke of their soul crushing chains.

Then come old men again! Come young men and true!
Come gird on your armor, this conflict renew;
Tho' our foemen be strong we have nothing to fear,
For the Right it shall conquer and Victory appear.

The voice has gone forth; the land shall awake,
And the people shall gather from Ocean to Lake;
Our cause is as pure as the earth ever saw,
And our faith we will pledge in the thrilling huzza.
Then huzza! then huzza!
Truth's glittering falchion
For Freedom we draw.

Thy hill-tops, New England, shall leap at the cry,
And the Prairies and far-distant South shall reply;
It shall roll o'er the land till the farthermost glen Gives back the grand summons again and again.

The "Kn-Klux" shall hear in their "conclaves" of blood;
And "Masonry" read the "hand-writing of God;"
Niagara's torrent shall thunder it forth;
It shall burn in the Sentinel Star of the North.

It shall blaze in the lightning and speak in the thunder,
Till each unhallowed fetters are riven asunder;
And Freedom her rights has triumphantly won,
And manhood its garments of glory put on.

Then shall tremble and quake—the vile dealers in gin—
Renounce their death traffic, abandon their sin;
Their leagues shall be broken, their craft overthrown,
Cold water shall triumph and reign on the throne.

Then come matron, come maiden, come manhood, come all!
Till these "dark" Christless "altars" shall crumble and fall;
Till the prowlers by day and the plotters by night,
Come to honor King Jesus and rejoice in his sight!
Then huzza! then huzza!
Truth's glittering falchion
For Freedom we draw.

Christianity and the Grange.

From the Lutheran Standard.

There are some members of secret fraternities who will not reason about the propriety of their connection. They become enraged as soon as this is called in question. But there are some who purpose to do right, and who are therefore willing to give attention to the Word of the Lord on this as on other subjects. Such persons may be turned from the error of their way while others may be warned against it, and herefore it is not wholly in vain to speak of secret societyism, offensive as any unfavorable mention of it is to many persons.

It is a fact which many of our pastors have had reason to deplore, that some church members, who have not been misled by secret societyism in its forms of Masonry, Druidism, Odd-fellowship, &c., have succumbed to its influence under the form of grangerism. The enemy, with which the church has waged a welfare for years, celebrated a triumph in the temporary success of the grange. By its promise of temporal advantage, and especially of protection to the farmers, men have been enticed into it who would not have yielded to the allurements of secret societyism in any other form.

Fidelity to the church and her precious truth re quire of us to warn against the evil, and assist in protecting our people against its encroachments. This is all the more necessary because there are still some well disposed people who profess themselves unable to see in the lodge any inconsistency with the church, and to whom the grange especially seems a harmless thing, which prudence would dictate to let alone. We would, from among the many objections which lie against it, select at present but two, to which we ask conscientious attention.

In the first place, is it right before God to enter into any association that, in its very organization as a secret body, provokes suspicion? It is said that there is nothing wrong done by the members when they meet together in secret in the lodge-room. What is done there we have no means of knowing. Suppose the transactions to be all honest and proper, such as could take place in public without any shame or disgrace; still is it right to excite suspicion by meeting only in secret and pledging all to keep everything secret? The Word of God says it is a sin. It says: "Abstain from all appearance of evil." Not only the evil must be avoided, but all appearance of evil, that the enemies of God's people may have no occasion to find fault.

It will not satisfy an earnest man's conscience to say, as is so often done, that others have their secrets as well as the lodge members. But, aside from the fact that the sins of others do not justify ours, there is manifestly some sophistry practiced in forming the excuse. Families, churches, &c., may have secrets. But if a family always keeps its house closed, and never lets anybody in unless he promises to keep everything secret that is going on there, will not suspicion be aroused, and that justly? If a church meets only in secret, and keeps guards stationed at the door to deny admittance to every person who has not pledged himself to divulge nothing that he hears or sees, would not the community have a reason to say that there must be something not right there?

Could such a body be recognized as conforming to the Lord's will? Would these people be obeying the Lord's words: "Abstain from all appearance of evil?" No, not a particle more than the lodge people. It would be sinful there also. Families, churches, states, are not secret societies, and would become sinful organizations if they became secret societies.

The suspicion that attaches to working in the dark is just, and Christians must avoid it. Our Lord says: "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works and glorify your Father which is in heaven." Matt. v. 16. Of himself our blessed Saviour says: "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing." Jno. xviii. 20. Hiding away in secret usually has its ground in the consciousness that exposure will provoke censure. "For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God." Jno. iii. 20–21. In view of such declarations of our Lord and Saviour, how can any one belong to a secret order and still suppose that he is obeying the command: "Abstain from all appearance of evil?"

The grange is a secret society as well as Masonry, and connection with it is a plain violation of an express command. Even if there is nothing evil going on in the lodge-room, the secret meetings and transactions present the appearance of evil; and from this a Christian must abstain. If he does not want to obey the Lord he is surely no longer a Christian.

But, in the second place, there is something more than the appearance of evil in the grange, just as there is in other secret organizations. There is actual evil in it.

In justification of their course grangers, who profess to be Christians also, sometimes say, just as other secret societyists say, that their lodge cannot be so bad, because they have the Bible, and a chaplain, and regular prayers. Some have even gone so far as to say that it is as good as the church, inasmuch as it has a minister and a religious service. Now that it has a chaplain, and prayers, and a burial service, is just one of the principal objections to it. It would be much less objectionable if it had none of these.

Why cannot a Lutheran Christian become a member, for instance, of a Romish congregation? It has a priest, and prayers, and a ritual, and is in fact a church. Why then can he not join it? It is because he would be joined together with persons who have not and confess not the true faith. He might say that he intends to remain a Lutheran, but he would be confessing doctrines utterly inconsistent with his statement. In his heart he cannot be a Romanist and a Lutheran at the same time, and his profession would be a mere pretense. No Lutheran congregation could be willing to retain him among its members unless he would withdraw from membership in the Romish congregation.

The grange has its chaplain and prayers, and its members engage in worship. But there are in the grange those who deny Christ as well as those who elsewhere profess his name, and its religion is of course wide enough to embrace them all in one brotherhood. Now, how can a Lutheran become one of such a congregation of worshipers without abandoning the faith which he professes as a member of the Lutheran church? The grange does not even worship in the name of Christ, else infidels could not be accepted as members as well as Christians. How then can a Christian take any part in it? The Bible says: "Whatsoever ye do, in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." Col. iii. 17. Do grangers enter the lodge and work and worship there in the name of the Lord Jesus? Our Redeemer says: "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do, that the Father may be glorified in the Son," Jno. xiv. 13, and: "All things whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." Matt. xxi. 22. Does the grange pray in the name of Jesus and believing in him? And is it Christian prayer, or is it sinful mockery, when prayers are offered by Christians and infidels in a society that agrees to prayers which infidels are able and willing to offer?

How can Christians be at ease in their consciences to join such an association when our Lord expressly says: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, and what communion hath light with darkness? And what concord hath Christ with Belial? Or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel?" 2 Cor. v. 14–15. "Wherefore come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord." 2 Cor. vi. 17.

The Sequel to "Willie Lyon's Great Trouble."

Willie enjoyed himself very much in the church at D——, and soon won among his new associates his old reputation as a "good fellow" ready to follow promptly the advice of any one who saw fit to advise him. He found in his new relationship that much he had heard about the way of life being "a strait and narrow way" was old-fashioned, and had given way to the modern spirit of improvement.

One of the most noticeable evidences of modern progress is found in the general improvement of highways and means of travel. The church at D—— had with its accustomed enterprise, under the leadership of Elder Brown, overhauled the "Highway of Holiness" and made it much easier for the travel of its members, so that now, all who would pay their dues and attend, when convenient, upon the ordinances of the church, found no difficulty in walking with it.

When Willie made the Bible his "main study," he was so prompt in imbibing Baptist sentiments that it is hardly probable that Presbyterian influence could have reached him; but still, it was doubtless lucky that he did not fall in with a Presbyterian while on his way from his mother's to the Baptist church at W——, as in that case he would likely have been lost to the Baptist cause forever. While certain passages made a very profound impression upon him, others seemed to have escaped him, else he would have learned to "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them;" and again, "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers, for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, and what communion hath light with darkness, and what concord hath Christ with Belial, or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel." He was already a disciple of secrecy, and it was evident that while he believed that Christ required him to be baptized and join the church; and had nowhere commanded him to join a secret society, yet he would refuse obedience to the positive command unless he could compel the church into fellowship with his secrecy.

If he had been disposed to listen to the "leading Deacon," he might have learned that while Good Templarism is perhaps the most amiable of the secret fraternities, yet in the church it would be used as a stepping-stone to other, and dangerous forms of secrecy; until in the Royal Arch degree of Masonry, it would require a pointed recognition of the divinity of that same Bel or Belial which the Bible declares that Christ can have no concord with.

However, he got along bravely with the church at D——. He found that secret institutions were very popular among his brethren; in fact, this refusal to join the church at W—— was accepted as heroism on the part of his mother by the church at D——, and in compliment to her courage they speedily initiated him into the order of Red Men, Knights of Pythias, Thousand and One, Odd-fellows, and, upon showing an exceedingly large pumpkin which had grown from a seed lodged in the outer edge of his mother's pig-pen, he was duly initiated into the mysteries of the grange.

By this time he had attracted the attention of a "leading deacon" in the church at D——, who told him of the wonderful light hidden in the mysteries of Masonry; that God had made a special revelation in behalf of Masons; that Masonry was the "handmaid of religion"; that Noah, Solomon and John the Baptist had been high Masons in their day, and that if he should join them, a knowledge of their grips and signs would be of great advantage to him in his future life. With his accustomed zeal, he applied at once for initiation into this wonderful mystery.

He went to his mother for some money for "a very important purpose;" and she in the fullness of her motherly heart, sold her last cow, and sent her dear Willie the proceeds, thinking it better that his younger brother Johnny should stay at home from school that winter, for want of suitable clothing and books, rather than that Willie fail in securing some wonderful good at which he had vaguely hinted.

Willie was soon in his element, and being a promising young man he was rapidly advanced along the highway of Masonry. The "leading deacon" of the church at D—— adjusted the cable-tow around his neck, and mouthed over for him to repeat, in his nude and blindfolded condition, the awful oaths of Masonry, by which he agreed that his throat might be cut across, his tongue torn out by the roots, etc., if he ever revealed any of these foolish secrets intrusted to him.

It was pretty tough work for Willie at first, as he remembered for a moment the positive command of the Saviour to "swear not at all," but Elder Brown, who was present, and who assisted in stripping and examining Willie in the preparation room, told him that God was very partial to Masonry and did not allude to Masonic swearing.

Willie was astonished to find that old Jim Beerbarrel, the brewer, a noisy old infidel on the street, was chaplain, and read the prayers for the lodge. While Willie was in this perplexity the whole lodge joined in singing the following hymn:

> "When earth's foundations first were laid
> By the Almighty artist's hand,
> 'Twas then our perfect laws were made
> Established by his strict command.
> Hail! mysterious, Hail! glorious Masonry
> That makes us ever great and free."

Willie was at once convinced, and he went on taking the succeeding oaths with alacrity. By the time he had finished the Royal Arch degree, he had bound himself to sixty-nine repetitions of the words, "furthermore do I promise and swear" to do things, or not to do things, every one of which was foolish and uncalled for, and many of which were awfully blasphemous and wicked. When he came to the clause which drove Dr. Colver from the lodge, he bolted it at a gulp and invoked upon himself the awful penalty of having "the top of his skull smitten off and his brain exposed to the scorching rays of the sun" if he ever failed in any of these points to which he had bound himself, and he called upon "Almighty God to keep him faithful in the due performance of the same."

Willie now found that he had been very much deceived by reading the Bible and listening to his mother. He had been taught in that way, that there was no entrance into heaven but through Christ as the door, but he now found that by taking oaths and keeping Masonic secrets, he was secure of the "Grand Lodge above," which, is not heaven itself, he thought must be very near to it, separated, perhaps, only by a narrow gulf.

About this time old Jim Beer-barrel died. He accidentally fell into a vat of beer, and while trying to swim across it, a loose cork got into his mouth, so that being unable to shut it, he soon filled and sank. His brethren fished him out with sad hearts, and he was buried with great pomp by the fraternity. The county papers published the resolutions of the lodge: "that whereas, it has pleased the great architect of the Universe to remove our dear brother Beerbarrel from the lodge below to the Grand Lodge above," etc.

Willie succeeded him as chaplain and carried the Bible—that "great light in Masonry"—in the procession to the grave. Elder Brown complimented the lodge as "effectually supplementing the work begun by the church, but for which it had proved itself incompetent."

Willie was a good boy and loved his mother, and at first he had a few qualms about going to a heaven where his mother could not come; and at one time he resolved to teach her privately the gripes, pass-words, signs and winks, by which he hoped to gain the "Grand Lodge above;" but he remembered that women are not good at keeping secrets, so he kept his jewel, and learned in due time to regard her Masonically as a cowan, and classed her with "old men, young men, mad-men and fools."

Willie is now one of the leading men in D——. He consents to patronize the church as it makes him popular with a certain class; and then it may prove a useful institution in saving the above mentioned classes of old men, young men, mad-men, fools and women, who cannot become Masons, and seems about the only chance for the halt, the maimed, and the blind. But he yields to no such prejudices in reference to himself. As fast as the young men of his school get old enough and can raise the money, he ropes them into the lodge, as he is unwilling that any should be lost who have money and can keep secrets. He knows that two strings to a man's bow are as valuable as they are to a girl's, and so he helps all that he can to the string of Masonry. He is making money in the town and is frequently elected to office. There are, at times, whispers of certain irregularities in his conduct, but all these things are promptly hushed by his Masonic brethren in the church. He visits his mother at long intervals. Her health is now poor, and to her friends she looks like a woman whose "gray hairs are coming down in sorrow to the grave." J. W. W.

How Liberal!

Freemasonry claims to be liberal because it receives every naturally good man, or who becomes sufficiently good for it by means of the various religions in the world. It has no gospel for the guilty and depraved. It is the stronghold of the modern pharisee and flatters the vanity of young men and old who have purse enough to pay for the title of being a good Mason, under the delusion that a good Mason must be a good man. We often meet with Masons who neglect church services or even scorn them who plainly say that Freemasonry is good enough for them. And it is so. The system is good enough for the sentiments nursed in the lodges. But the whole system is merely a development of the evil principle by which Satan transforms himself into an angel of light. The true light shines, but men prefer darkness. There is a tendency in man to substitute his way for God's way, to refuse to submit to divine authority, wherefore many have strong delusion and believe the lie. And in these liberal days, neighbor, don't say a word that will show you don't think the one as good as the other. O yes, be liberal. Be so liberal as not to distinguish between the true and the false, and be careful never to say a word to show any one the difference. Thus dwell at ease. Let others fret against wrong, but "Let us eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die." H.

The Last Labors of Rev. A. Crooks.

Over four months ago Bro. Crooks left Syracuse to attend the Fall Conferences of the Wesleyan Methodist Connection. These held their sessions in in Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas and Tennesee. He left home in August in apparently good health and high spirits. Two Conferences in Ohio, and one in Indiana, each of a week's duration, were passed, when he reported himself as feeling poorly in health. At the Michigan Conference he was still worse, though able to do business. He sold many books, took pledges and donations to the Publishing House fund, the Missionary Society, Superannuated Fund, renewals and subscriptions for the American Wesleyan and the Children's Banner, of this city, of which he was the publisher and one of the editors. Though troubled with what was denominated hay fever, he would not consent to remain in Michigan, but pushed on to the Illinois Conference, held the following week. Waiting on the route in a cheerless depot at night, where there was no fire, gave him a chill from which he did not recover for hours. This was followed by fever and sleeplessness, and when he arrived at his destination in Illinois, he was showing signs of severe illness. He reported to the Conference the state of the connectional affairs of which he was the agent, and with assistance did his business with the Conference. Efforts were made to dissuade him from going to Iowa the following week, but nothing daunted, he arose, after two days' delay, and attended by a delegation of careful brethren, proceeded thither. There his fever grew worse, and was declared to be a "malignant type of typhoid fever." In his more comfortable hours, when free from delirium, he earnestly thought of pushing on to Kansas. From this purpose he was dissuaded and another was sent in his stead. Confined to his bed in Iowa for some two weeks, he appeared better, and arose and departed for the seat of the Minnesota Conference. He often alluded to the attentions he received at the hands of the brethren who watched by his side in Iowa and also of the good providences of God which attended him on this journey. In one place where connections could not be made, a special car, in which he could sleep, was provided, free of charge, on the hint of his desire. In Minnesota and Wisconsin his fever and weakness and occasional chills followed him. But with an unconquerable purpose, and a faith that never grew dim he felt equal to any task which the duties of his office demanded. He attended a dedication and preached a sermon in Wisconsin after the adjournment of the Conference, and then came on to Xenia, Ohio, and attended another dedication at which he preached. He then returned home, having arranged with Rev. E. Coate, of Indiana, to go for him to Tennesee. Dr. Crooks lost thirty pounds in flesh in his absence, and five more after his return, but he "bated no jot of heart or hope." He expected to push on his work to a splendid consummation, for which he declared he had more courage than ever.

He arrived in the city about November 1st, after an absence of ten weeks, and has been slowly recovering, and by turns having relapses of less or greater importance since. He had such fortitude that no obstacle seemed too hard for him. No Spartan was more austere in the rigid observance of personal disipline, nor was Regulus more faithful to promises. The principles of justice and human rights received his adoption in early youth, and clung to him through four years of missionary labor twenty-five years ago in North Carolina and Virginia, and he yielded nothing when incarcerated in Southern prisons and threatened with death. The self-poised fearlessness which had always been a marked trait of his character, no doubt accounts for his dispensing so much with the services of a physician. He hoped and believed that he should get well, and so often had risen above and worn off disease, by giving it little attention, that he thought he could do so again. But his expections failed, and he fell in the midst of life's battle, a little more than fifty years of age.—Wesleyan.

Creeds as Covenants.

The dual nature of church creeds is very generally overlooked. Most people think of a creed as only a form of belief; and, as they claim the unlimited right of changing their belief at pleasure, they are amazed when any one protests against their unbridled license of belief. The covenant nature of creeds is as certainly worthy of regard as the belief nature. The churches have no other bond of union among their members than the creed, to which each member subscribes on entering the church. Church-members are not pledged with fearful oaths to be consistent and true to their brethren. The creed, including the chief features of government, is the sole covenant among the members of a church. Hence, while it may be granted that a man may change his opinion as often as he pleases, (provided he is willing to be regarded as a "double-minded man,") yet it cannot be admitted that he may break a covenant whenever he takes a notion to do so. A church-member, after changing his form of belief in certain respects, is still held by the covenant nature of the creed which he has rejected in part or as a whole, and is in honor bound to consult the peace and harmony of his brethren by keeping his new belief in abeyance. . .

We venture to say that the covenant nature of a creed is not only as important as the belief nature, but is really more important. If there is one thing in a church that the Bible places above all others, it is peace. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem; they shall prosper that love thee." But what is peace? Not a craven yielding of conscience and feeling to rude covenant-breakers. It is not the granting of every demand made by partisans, that they may be rendered harmless and gracious. The Bible speaks of no such peace. It requires no one to procure such peace by yielding everything. If one hundred thousand persons are brought into covenant relation to one another by the medium of a form of belief, and are at peace as long as they believe the same thing, and are in a state of anarchy and confusion when they begin to say that they believe they have changed their mind about such and such things, is it not apparent that the creed is their covenant? Now if five thousand of them—one in this congregation and another in that society throughout—say they have changed their mind, is it the duty of the ninety-five thousand to change their mind also, exactly as the few have done (or say they have done), just to have peace? No; it is very clear that the few are required to respect the covenant nature of the formulated creed, and waive for a while their new belief, if they really have one. But what do we witness these "last days," so full of "perilous times," as seen by Paul and described to Timothy? Church-members are "truce-breakers," exalting their boasted beliefs above solemn covenants. They thus become to be "false accusers" of their brethren who are willing to respect their covenants. The conservative and conscientious brethren, who believe that harmony is more conducive to the prosperity of Jerusalem than is free-thinking, are called uncharitable, dominering, and non-progressive by the "heady" devotees to free-thinking.

Let us not be understood. Freedom of thought is good, and it is not incompatible with the observance of covenants. But freedom of thought is not the license to think just as one pleases, at his own time, unless he is ready to take the consequences upon himself, and not thrust them upon others who ought not to bear them. . . .

Now, since it is admitted that men have a right to change their opinions and beliefs, what is the sin of those men who have changed? It is the breach of covenant, and the willful disturbing of the peace of the church. The good that might even come from the change to a possibly better belief will, in no sense, compensate for the mischief that follows from the schism and strife. We say that the new creed may be better than the old; but the case is not proved. A church, for instance, that has stood and prospered for one hundred years has not done so in spite of an "Iniquitous" creed to which it has clung. If innovators in such a church propose a better creed, they must expect to reason with no little force to show that the church has been wrong. They have, indeed, undertaken a serious work, and on amount of fillibustering and ad captandum writing and talking will enroll them with true reformers. Christians ought to be serious-minded. License of belief is a small good, and can claim no place with religious freedom.—Religious Telescope.

Call for a Convention in the City of Mansfield, Ohio, Feb. 17th and 18th, 1875,

TO INVESTIGATE THE SYSTEM OF FREEMASONRY AND KINDRED ORDERS.

No intelligent citizen of our country need be informed that there exists in our land a complicated and wide-spread system of secret combinations. Freemasonry alone reports officially more than half a million of our adult male population in its connection, and the Odd-fellows something less, while the Patrons of Husbandry claim a million and a half in their order. These are flanked by Sovereigns of Industry, Knights of Pythias, Red Men, Daughters of Rebekah, Androgynous (or female) Masonry, etc., making in the aggregate a most formidable army from which the interested but uninitiated public are carefully excluded.

Many active Christians and patriots both clerical and lay, are apprehensive of grave evils resulting to society, the State and the church from these secret combinations, and while looking upon them as hostile to a republican state and the Christian equality of mankind, they find in their workings a satisfactory solution of many confessedly strange decisions in our civil and ecclesiastical courts. Others regard these secret orders as trivial and unimportant, and consequently see no cause of alarm, and feel little concern on their account.

Believing that the cause of God and the welfare of mankind would be greatly promoted by a union of all Christians and patriot citizens upon the exact truth; and believing that the substantial truth may be attained by the use of proper means; and believing that one of the most efficient means to this end is free discussion; we do therefore cordially invite such of our fellow-citizens as believe that the ceremonies, obligations, signs, grips, pass-words, principles and governments of Freemasonry and kindred orders are legitimate subjects for discussion, and who believe that they ought to be correctly submitted to the public for an intelligent verdict as to their utility or mischievous influence, to meet in convention at the city of Mansfield, Ohio, Feb. 17th, 1875, at 2 o'clock p. m., in the ———, at which hour Rev. Wm. Wishart, D. D., will call the meeting to order, and the convention proceed to organize by selecting its officers and adopting such rules and regulations as it may elect.

From the General Agent—To Workers in Michigan and Iowa.

NEVADA, Ohio, Jan. 8, 1875.

Absence from the State and irregularities incident to constant journeyings have rendered delays in answering correspondents inevitable. Over twenty letters, written in December last, were awaiting me on my arrival at this place last evening. Some of them having been forwarded three times from as many different States.

I am much gratified with the interest indicated in Iowa and Michigan in State conventions. I trust friends in these States and elsewhere will not slacken their efforts or be discouraged. I would gladly write you each, or better, grasp your hands if it were possible, but in this great work and in this great country I find myself unable always to do what I would.

Bro. C. Compton, of Steamboat Rock, Iowa, proposes Eldora as a suitable place for holding a State Convention. What do you say brethren? Shall we hold a convention in Eldora, Iowa, which is on the Central Railroad? Say the 24th and 25th of February, or the 3d and 4th of March. If you will take hold of the matter I will do all in my power to aid you and will (D. V.) be at the meeting.

Bro. Francis Semple suggests Ottumwa. Who is in favor of Ottumwa, or who has other places or place to propose? I think Iowa should have a convention this winter if possible, and that the sooner the time and place is determined the better. Let all who are willing to sign a call similar to the call for the Ohio meeting send their names to the Secretary at Chicago, and this will indicate your interest. The N. C. A. will aid you in every way practicable if you are ready to work.

Several points have been suggested for Michigan, but not one definitely proposed. Brethren, if you mean business, as most of your letters indicate, I have a proposal to make: That a convention be held on the 17th and 18th of March at the Capitol of your State, if practicable, and if not at some suitable point as near as may be, and that all who are in favor of a convention send their names to the Secretary at Chicago to be signed to a call. A good brother in your State, whose letter is before me, indicates that he is ready for the work, and I know of no reason why his energy, ability, experience and devotion should not be consecrated to God in this reform in your State. God I believe has raised up the man, will you join in helping to prepare the way for his usefulness.

Affectionately, etc.,

J. P. STODDARD.

Reform News.

The New York State Meeting from a Canadian View.

LONDON, Ont. 29th Dec., 1874.

DEAR FRIEND:—Your letter was just received in time to admit of my attending the N. Y. State Convention, which met at Lockport, Niagara Co., on the 22d, 23d and 24th last. I was there at the beginning and remained till the close.

From some unaccountable mismanagement no proper arrangement had been made for advertising the meeting. The secretists took advantage of this at all points and tried to conceal the fact of the Convention. No one knew anything at all of it. The delegates, however, found out the place, and though the audiences were meagre in comparison to what they might and ought to have been, the object was accomplished and the thing is a success.

The Convention held their sittings in the "Good Templar's Hall" at the foot of Maine St. Here we anti-secretists, like Samson of old, had to eat our honey out of the dead lion's carcas. The honey was not the less sweet that it had to come out of the eater, who got paid for the accommodation. It would have been more pleasant had we been furnished with our meeting place in some church of Anti-masonic faith. We were at home, however, in our own hired hall, and had full liberty. Both on Wednesday and Thursday a brass band discoursed music to us on the street, but whence and for what purpose they came I did not learn. . . . . The Convention was unanimous on various important points.

1st. That no intelligent Mason, fully informed on the teaching and aims of the lodge, can be a Christian.

2d. That no Christian church should knowingly fellowship Freemasons.

3d. That Freemasonry is antagonistic to the State and the best interests of civil liberty and equality.

4th. That every Anti-mason should make his influence felt at the polls and vote for no Mason to fill any office of honor or trust in the gift of the people.

A hearty vote of thanks was given to the citizens for their hospitality, which will be long remembered with gratitude by the delegates. If the inhabitants of Lockport knew, or affected to know, little of this gathering in their enterprising city, they heard much that saddened and sobered them. Many will not look on their pet institution in the same light as formerly.

To me it has been a precious privilege to meet with dear brethren in Christ, who are bearing their cross after Jesus, and rejoicing to be counted worthy to suffer for his sake. Should we never meet on earth may we meet around the throne to receive the Saviour's welcome, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

With much respect, I am yours in Jesus. JAMES DONALDSON.

Lecture at Greenwood, Ill.

By invitation of brother A. W. Murphy, I went up to the quiet little village of Greenwood, a distance of eighteen miles, and there lectured on Masonry on the 22d and 23d of Dec. They had a sing in the other church (Congregational) the first night, and a grange meeting the second evening. Still, our congregations were good and we had a glorious time. We spoke in the Baptist church. The Baptist brethren there are pretty strong Anti-masons, and they and their resident minister turned out and gave good heed to the things spoken. The ministers there, as elsewhere, are pretty thoroughly under the power of Masonry, and but very few of them ventured out to the lectures. They hate the light, that is, Anti-masonic light, and will not come thereto lest their deeds should be reproved.

Our Methodist brother came the first night, but not the second. He claims to have been an "Anti," but the grangers have roped him in and he now has a silent tongue on Masonry: and so the grange everywhere is sealing the lips of those who have been Anti-masons. But the thing is bursting, and the re-action in favor of anti-secrecy is sure to follow.

The boasted antiquity of Masonry, the infidel nature of its religion, the blasphemous and murderous character of its oaths, were subjects of discussion in the first lecture. The position and power of this secret empire in our Republic, and the demoralizing influence of the same on the politics, religion, morals, and sociality of the country were taken up the second evening and that with apparent good effects.—O. C. Burch in Meth. Free Press.

GREENE, Jay Co., Ind., Dec. 31, 1874.

BROTHER KELLOGG:—I have been rather lukewarm in the anti-secret cause for a number of years, and stood off looking on the contest going on with indifference, till J. K. Kiggins came into this vicinity and lectured at Hopewell Church (United Brethren in Christ.) He lectured three times to a crowded house, with quite a number of Masons and grangers. The withering rebuke he gave the Masonic oaths and their doings in the lodge, brought down the ire of Masons and grangers alike. He left with a "Godspeed you" by his friends, and bitter denunciations of the workers of darkness. This was in October last.

Again he was passing through Portland, our county seat, and wrote to Lewis Crisler, a staunch friend of the cause, and myself, who have at an advanced age, taken a decided stand in the cause of right, that if we would meet him at that point of the railroad, he would lecture for us again. We brought him here on the 28th inst., and we got quite a scourging for our pains from the secret orders. He lectured three times again. Brother Higgins is a powerful lecturer, quite eloquent, and sends consternation and dismay to the hearts of all workers of darkness.

I pray that God, in his mercy, will raise up more like Brother Kiggins.

On the first night of the last lecture, a Mason present, belonging to the Grand Lodge of this State, and a Patron of Husbandry, wished to have something to say by way of discussion. The State Lecturer spoke three-fourths of an hour; he then gave way to him who was to show secretism in its true light. He spoke two hours and ten minutes without any aim, and with much repetition and abuse. He evidently kept on to kill time, and he succeeded well in that particular, but to the utter disgust of the whole congregation. I think the cause is on the increase here. Heaven grant that it may be the case. CAREY WALKER.

From Darke Co., Ohio.

ITHACA, Ohio, Dec. 12, 1874.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

We have just been favored with a visit from the Ohio State Agent, Rev. D. S. Caldwell, who gave us two interesting lectures before large and attentive audiences. The first was on Saturday night, Dec. 12th, in which the speaker showed in a clear and candid manner that Freemasonry was antagonistic to the teachings of Christ and utterly hostile to every principle of Christianity. He set forth the principles of Christianity as taught by Christ and his apostles on the one hand, and Masonry as taught by Mackey, Chase, Sickels, Davis, and others, upon the other, and proved to a demonstration that the two systems are utterly irreconcilable with each other, and that no man could possibly be an intelligent Mason and a Christian at the same time.

On the Sabbath he gave us an appropriate and timely sermon on the Divinity of Jesus Christ, from the text: "For in him dwelleth all the fullness of the God-head bodily." Col. ii. 9. On last evening he dwelt upon the political feature of Masonry, showing it to be in direct conflict with civil government, and therefore antagonistic to all republican principles. He established clearly to every unprejudiced mind that Masonry was entirely despotic, treasonable and rebellious. All of which he proved from their own recognized standard authors, beyond a peradventure. In proof of this he gave the fraternity the privilege of correcting any misrepresentations, but they answered never a word. Upon the whole we feel that, although we have a lodge in our town, yet by the timely and manly manner in which Mr. Caldwell handled his subject, that our cause has achieved a glorious victory. Mr. C. has given other lectures in this part of the State, all of which, we learn, have been equally successful.

PHILEMON CROMWELL, SR.

Correspondence.

A Call from Medina County, Ohio.

MALLET CREEK, Medina Co., Ohio, Jan. 8, 1875.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—My subject being of general interest, and wishing to get the attention of Bro's Stoddard and Caldwell, and knowing not where to reach them, as they are on the wing, plesse notice the following facts.

Medina, our county seat, a stronghold of secret societies, has hitherto baffled our endeavors to secure a good place for Bro. Stoddard to lecture. But times are changing. Yestarday I met the Hon. H. G. Blake, a high Mason, and the owner of the largest and nicest hall in town, and he of his own accord, offered me the free use of his hall any time when not engaged, for one or several meetings. This offer, no doubt, is made in good faith, and will be gratefully accepted and improved as soon as Bro's Stoddard and Caldwell can be with us.

The cause of this change is apparent to me. There are good men among the Masons who have been deceived as to the true character of Masonry, and were made to believe that the first thing to secure success in business or in politics was to become a Mason. Such as have advanced up to the Royal Arch degree now know that Masonry designs to rule, and what they canno rule, to crush and destroy. And the history of the war, and of Masonry during and since the war, has satisfied them that our republican institutions cannot outlive a republican form of government, and a republican government cannot be ruled by secret signs and grips. And so soon as they can see united, persevering and persistent efforts put forth as shall promise success and create a public sentiment that will save them from violent persecution of the fraternity, all such will stand from under and fall into our ranks just so fast as they have the moral courage to honor their convictions and brave the secret plottings of the evil men in the lodge. Aside from this all good men know that God is either with the Masons or with us, and not both. If with us, resistance is useless and cannot avail only to prolong the war and degrade themselves. If God be with them, resistance is needless, because they cannot be overthrown. Forty years ago, some of us waged an exterminating war against American slavery, with only this one thing to encourage us, that God was with us. At that time had all good men joined us and voted as we prayed God would have given us the victory without the shedding of blood. But what Dr Barnes said of slavery, is true to-day in reference to secret societies, the American churches are the bulwarks of Masonry. We never for once lost our confidence in ultimate success in regard to slavery, because God was with us. Neither do I doubt of ultimate success in the war on Masonry. But in view of the position of many of our churches and the clergy, I can say with Jefferson, "I tremble for my country when I remember that God is just and that his justice cannot sleep forever." Many of the churches and their ministers persue the same course as they did in reference to slavery. "I am just as much of an Anti-mason as you are; but there are other evils in the world besides Masonry."—Shut their eyes and ears too, stay away from lectures and keep others away. Should Masonry be wiped out in blood as was slavery, much of the sin will lay at the door of the clergy and churches who know, or would know if they would open their eyes and ears, their Master's will, but do it not.

I have more hope of many Masons than of this class of Christians who refuse to take sides with Jesus Christ, simply because his cause is unpopular. I have good authority to say that such are not Christians; that they only have a name to live while they are dead in sin. Christ says his sheep hear his voice and follow him; that they will not follow strangers. He came into the world and established his church to reform the world, hence that church that turns its back upon reform, is not the church of Jesus Christ. All reforms (so long as the devil is loose) must of necessity be unpopular. Those churches that are wafted along on the popular current are on the direct train to hell, and their leaders are blind leaders of the blind. No one doubts this unless they are ignorant of, or disbelievers in Christ's teachings.

Yours for God's light and truth opposed to all secret clans or cliques or fraternities. SAMUEL HALE.

Grange Practice.

WILLSHIRE, O.

Editor Cynosure:

DEAR SIR:—We have had grangerism to contend with in this part of the country for the last six or eight months. We are glad to say that in this part of the country it is getting old, and is loosing power. At a grange supper not long since, they had quite a row among themselves. One man disgracefully abused his own child, so much so that an officer had to lead him out of the lodge. The joke is, the grange had been preaching that there was so much love in grangerism. The above is true, as witnessed to me. Yours,

W. H. OGLE.

Who Controls the Good Templars?

NEW CHARTER.—The new charter, ordered by the R. W. G. L., we learn has been completed and is now being supplied to Grand Worthy Secretaries. The design is represented as being beautiful. The Casket describes it thus:

"The ground work is a light pink color. At the top are several female figures emblematic of Faith, Hope, and Charity, and on either side is the representation of an ancient Knight Templar with sword and shield, and just above each of these figures is a globe with the I. O. G. T. encircling."—New Jersey Good Templar.

I. O. G. T. Independent indeed! Even the charters of the New Jersey lodges have on them an armed Knight Templar. Who control an order so true to its name as this; Masons, or temperance people? Let the people answer. We say it is Freemasonry's smartest daughter.

ONCE A GOOD TEMPLAR.

Our Politics.

VIOLA, Ill., Jan. 4, 1875.

DEAR BRO. KELLOGG:—I consider your "political column" in the Cynosure of very great interest in the moral war with organized secrecy now being waged. Though many good men take holy fright at the bare mention of politics in this reform, yet I am fully persuaded that a column or two set apart in the Cynosure for a free and Christian discussion of political bearings in this controversy will yield fruit for good.

Were we ruled by a monarchy where the popular voice could not be heard, political discussion would be useless, insurrectionary, and might be wrong; but in a republic of individual sovereignty, I see a duty in it that becomes a sin if neglected, or indifferently performed. A Christian man in these United States can by no possible means rid himself of political responsibility. He may vote with the masses without thought or care, or with the few with intense solicitude, or neglect to vote out of contempt or indifference, it is still true of him as a sovereign citizen—he is responsible for the moral status of politics in his country, State or town.

In the great Judgment Day, when the recording angel stands with open books, when at the page of "slain in the great American Rebellion," should be asked "who slew all these?" what will Americans answer? Not the rebels; not the Union men. O no, not these, either, or both together; it was the voters since 1776 who willingly or carelessly gave slavery a place in this nation while voting could have prevented it. They were the murderers of all of them.

What if our ancesters, Revolutionary sires, plead ignorance, or innocence of intention in accepting the responsibility of national sovereignty and its results, the facts remain the same; they did it. So now responsibility attaches to every voter for future preservation of life and this Republic, and with the light of the past this sacred trust may not be innocently disregarded.

To stick to party ties through party fears, without a careful weighing of moral obligations, is to surrender right to wrong, and so make ourselves the instrument of that wrong. The intemperance of to-day is thus chargable to a lack of right political action on the part of Christian and moral men, to whom I fear will be charged in the great day "all these slain."

So, too, in our controversy with organized secrecy, an element in our country that fears not God nor regards man, to pray against it, and vote for it for the sake of party, or out of holy indignation refuse to vote at all, either with the many because wrong, or with the few because hopeless, or for fear of political enthusiasm, is, simply, to ask God to do a work which you will neither aid nor sanction, but do oppose; and so mock God.

The times are now ominous of great events in our country, both political and religious, and how are Christians to fight the good fight and keep the faith for the kingdom of Christ and this Republic with either political party as leader; the one ignoring God and humanity, the other ignoring God, the Bible and the Sabbath, as well as humanity? Search and see.

J. C. GRAHAM.

"Our Sabbaths."

BROTHER KELLOGG:—An article in the Cynosure of Nov. 12th, a quotation from the Advance, has attracted attention and deserves notice, because it advocates the Sabbath. Truth should not be mixed with error, if so all may be cast off together. The writer evidently has reference to the "Sabbath of the Lord" when he says "our Sabbath." We may make any day a Sabbath, but the Lord our God made the seventh day the Sabbath. The writer says, "the Sabbath of Divine right belongs to us. No power has the right to take it away from us." In this he is right. Again he is right in saying it was "ordained at the creation of man," "Sanctified anew in the wilderness," "re-affirmed by our Saviour" but where he says "had the crowning grace put upon it by the change, from the last to the first day of the week," he is awfully wrong, for such a thing has never been done by Divine authority, it has been done by the puny man, and the thus changing from where God placed it, is the very thing condemned by said writer. He says "it would be treason to the truth if Christians should fail for any reason to stand up for the truth." So say I. Then what is truth about the Sabbath?

The ten commandments fix the truth to be that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord," from creation, reaffirmed in the wilderness, and by our Redeemer. I agree with the good writer as to the observance of the holy Sabbath, but when Christian men, D. D.'s at that, teach the observance of the first day as the sanctified Sabbath of the Lord, and fail to produce one "thus saith the Lord" in its support, in direct opposition to the seventh day which is the only sanctified day known in the Bible, it is not strange that so many disregard the Sabbath. The Bible is accepted as God's will to man; and when its truth and men's practice differ, and the churches hold to the custom of men in their teachings and practice, it is not strange that so many are skeptics.

I write to call the attention of all who read our excellent Cynosure to the fact that the sanctity has never been removed from the seventh day, and it cannot be done, until God declares that he did not rest on the seventh day and hallow it. As to the resurrection of Jesus, it took place on the first day of the week, and the facts are, he neither died nor arose on the Sabbath.

J. B. LOGAN.

OUR MAIL.

Mrs. C. W. Howell, Constable, N. Y., writes:

"I know that the cause is prospering. A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. We have Bernard, Finney, Morgan and Valance besides our weekly paper, and those tracts you sent me. They are all read and re-read."

Mrs. H. M. Cushman, Pawlet, Vt., writes:

This place is under Masonic influence, and for the last three years I have been perfectly disgusted with their way of doing business."

Mrs. Harriet Marsh, Harpersville, N. Y., writes:

"I well remember the Morgan affair as I was then twenty-six, and my husband took great pains to inform himself. Bought Bernard's Light on Masonry and some other publications that gave us a very clear insight into its diabolical corruption. Had my husband lived to see this day, he as well as myself, would say God speed the overthrow of all secret societies, Masonry not excepted, that our churches may be purified and our ministers free from such abominations."

Jarvis Gage, Green Oak Station, Mich., writes:

"I am circulating the petition; have got it most full. I hope you will continue to scatter the light. We hope the State will secure for their lecturer Bro. Rathbun. I am an old man. I lived in Morgan time near Batavia. So you see I am an Anti-mason dyed in the wool. The cause is gaining some here."

Daniel Leggett, Allegan, Mich., writes:

"I am surrounded with Masons, Odd-fellows and grangers. Not one will read an anti-secret paper for fear the truth will convict."

I. G. Welch, Plymouth, Mich., writes:

"In consequence of bodily infirmities incident to the human frame after a life of toil for more than seventy years, I have not been able to obtain but few signers to the petition, but I shall not cease my labors in the good cause."

C. M. Livesay, Nashville, Ill., writes:

"Although we are in the midst of hard times, and surrounded by Masons and Odd-fellows, you can enroll the names of T. W. J. Logan and C. M. Livesay in Bro. Hickman's regiment, and we will use all reasonable means to fulfil the pledge of obtaining six new subscribers each during the year 1875."

If these friends, surrounded by secret societies and hard times can do this, who, (trusting in God, showing faith by works) cannot?

D. C. Vaughan, Byron, Wis., writes:

"We are surrounded with secret organizations—Masons, Odd-fellows and grangers."

J. L. Wilson, Mt. Vernon, Ia., writes:

"Without agreeing with your views in every particular, I must say I am pleased with the evangelical and orthodox religious tone and the fearlessness and consistency manifested in the Cynosure."

Wandel Vine, Egota, Minn., writes:

"When we come to look at the real feeling of the community it is true that men love darkness rather than light."

J. A. Talmage, Port Oram, N. J., writes:

"I wish you all a happy New Year. . . I have got a few names on your petition you sent me, and will try for more. But those that seem favorable to the cause seem to be afraid of their own shadow."

Dr. G. W. D. White, Boone, Ia., writes:

"May God make the Cynosure a power in the pulling down the strongholds of sin in all its forms, and spiritual wickedness in high places by the unwinding of Satan's cable-tow from the necks and the bodies of men, so that they may not deny Jesus before men; and if they have any light that they may let it shine."

James Kilgore, Mercer, Pa., writes:

"I am now seventy-six years old and have lived to see slavery killed, and now if I could see all the secret lodges and all the still houses forever put away, then I would expect Christ's kingdom to come."

Aaron Stedman, Taberg, N. Y., writes:

"Morgan was carried by my door on his way to Niagara, and I have not forgotten it yet. I would write some incidents but it troubles me to hold the pen."

Mr. Stedman is nearly seventy-five years of age.

Elder J. Jackson, Gouldville, Vt., writes:

"There is a great host of Anti-masons in Vermont. But they are afraid. . . Elder Rollins has commenced to give lectures with good effect."

John M. Stevenson, Washington, Ia., writes:

"I have been circulating a petition to Congress and have obtained a good many names."

Wm. A. Bartlett, Elpaso, Ill., writes:

"I have been circulating the petition to Congress sent me from the Cynosure office, and find it uphill business in this locality. Not, however, because the principles set down in the petition are wrong and ought not to prevail, but from the fear of 'man which bringeth a snare.' This the great underlying difficulty more than anything else to the anti-secret reform. Were I to withhold my support from what I was willing to own or acknowledge to be right for fear it would injure my business matters or the sale of my articles in market, would it not be justly considered that my principles were in market?'"

David Thompson, Arkansas City, Kan., writes:

"Masonry has taken deep root here, but we live in hope that He who has said, Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted shall be rooted up', may hasten this in his time.'"

Silas Waldron, Norfolk, N. Y., writes:

"I am trying to stop the tide of Masonry. . . It has a strong hold here. . . The paper is doing a good work."

Susan Peebler, Sodaville, Oregon, writes:

"My whole heart is in the cause and I bid you God speed. I have been instrumental in getting one Mason to leave his lodge and denounce the same,—all from reading the Cynosure."

James Auten, Galion, O., writes:

"In reply to the request to fast, (Nov. 8th, 1874), I did fast honestly from six in the evening of the 7th until six on the morning of the 9th. I did not eat or drink one drop for thirty-six hours. I took care of my stock in the morning of the 8th, and took up my Bible and asked God to direct my eye for counsel. The first lesson was Hezekiah's trust and success. The second was Gideon's successful battle and warfare; and the third was Jeptha's success and victories. The day passed most satisfactorily, while I prayed for a final end of Masonry."

James Powars, St. Charles, Ill., sends six new subscriptions and two renewals, (we have put his name among those of the forming regiment) and writes:

"I am still pressing the canvass, and have the partial promise of a number of subscribers."

H. C. Stoughton, Duncan, Ill., writes:

"I have succeeded in sending you five or six new names within the last year. Let all do as well and the list will grow pretty fast. We very much need a good lecturer. A live man here to arouse the people. . . Pray for us here in this dark corner that light may break in on us and overwhelm the darkness."

T. B. McCormick, Princeton, Ind., writes:

O why are the people so slow to observe the signs of the times? I can say in the language of Thomas Jefferson when he referred to slavery, 'I tremble for my country.' How manifest it is that men love darkness rather than light.'"

Joseph Catterlin, Kewanee, Ill., writes:

"My heart is in this work and has been for the last forty years. . . This is a great place for Masonry."

Albert Hoyt, Carthage, N. Y., writes:

"The light is breaking out. The Cynosure is the paper for the times. Do not get discouraged. There is a glorious time coming soon."

Thos. Gilmer, New Concord, O., writes:

"It is sad indeed to see those who are professing Christians so apathetic in relation to the attainment of objects for which the National Christian Association was organized. . . . We fear there are entirely too many at the present day who like the Jews in the days of Haggai the prophet, are content to see the Lord's house lie waste, provided they are permitted to dwell in ceiled houses. Let such calmly consider the terrible judgment denounced upon those Jews for their indifference, and act accordingly."

John B. Stowell, Middleton, Idaho Ter., writes:

"I would rather lose all my other papers than the Cynosure. Yours for the war."

Wm. M. Boyd, Canal Lewisville, O., writes:

"The day will come when the redeemed host of heaven, and unchained thousands on earth, will shout the triumphs of our cause. For God will lay judgment to the line and righteousness to the plummet, and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters shall overflow the hiding places, and their covenant with death shall be disannulled, and their agreement with hell shall not stand."

John Smith, Baldwin, Pa., writes:

"I have not been able to do much in this place. Odd fellows are plenty. The M. E. churches are full of them, both preachers and members. There are some Freemasons also in the place. The cause has my heart and soul. I am in my seventy-seventh year. I am a local minister and elder in the M. E. church."

Benj. Ulsh, Silver Lake, Ind., writes:

Bro. Stoddard wrote me, truth is convincing; light is spreading; and I feel like doing what I can towards spreading light and truth."

Nathan Callender, Green Grove, Pa., writes:

"Our work is deepening and God is in it. The Cynosure is this hour the fixed star in the little solar system of reform journals."

Girden Crook, Concord, Pa., writes:

"I am with you and the cause, and shall be the short time the Lord lets me live; for I believe that the Lord will help us when we put away our sin and pray in the spirit."

S. Adams, Hastings, Minn., writes:

'Some one has kindly sent me the Cynosure for the last six months for which I am thankful. . . The church I serve is remarkably free from alliances with secret organizations."

The Sabbath School.

Lesson for Jan. 24, 1875.—Preparation for Conquest.

Joshua v. 9-15.—Commit to memory verses 13, 14.

9 And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you. Wherefore the name of the place is called Gilgal unto this day.

10 And the children of Israel encamped in Gilgal, and kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the month at even in the plains of Jericho.

11 And they did eat of the old corn of the land on the morrow after the passover, unleavened cakes, and parched corn in the selfsame day.

12 And the manna ceased on the morrow after they had eaten of the old corn of the land; neither had the children of Israel manna any more; but they did eat of the fruit of the land of Canaan that year.

13 And it came to pass, when Joshua was by Jericho, that he lifted up his eyes and looked, and, behold, there stood a man over against him with his sword drawn in his hand: and Joshua went unto him, and said unto him, Art thou for us, or for our adversaries?

14 And he said, Nay; but as captain of the host of the Lord am I now come. And Joshua fell on his face to the earth, and did worship, and said unto him, What saith my Lord unto his servant?

15 And the captain of the Lord's host said unto Joshua, Loose thy shoe from off thy foot: for the place whereon thou standest is holy. And Joshua did so.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Looking unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith.—Heb. xii. 2.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—The Lord's presence is the pledge of victory.

BIBLE READINGS.—(1) Ex. vi. 1-13; (2) Gal. v. 1-16; (3) Lev. xxiii. 9-22; (4) Ex. xvi. 11-35; (5) Dan. x. 10-21; (6) Heb. ii. 9-18; (7) Josh. v. 9-15.

This lesson is of especial interest to older scholars. God dealt with men then as now. This preparation had four elements in it; two from the people's side toward God, and two from God's side toward the people. Study them in this order.

Analysis.—I. Circumcision—a seal of God's covenant with Abraham; a sign of giving up sin in the heart and life. It had been omitted in the wilderness; it was now renewed. II.—Passover.—To recall the deliverance out of Egypt, would encourage Israel encamped before walled Jericho. III.—Manna discontinued—the people have the wheat of the land in its place. IV. Guidance, an armed man, with drawn sword appears to Joshua—assurance of victory.—Am. S. S. Union Series.

The Reproach of Egypt Rolled Off: What is meant by the "reproach of Egypt" may be seen by reference to Ex. xiv. 3; xxxii. 11, 12; Num. xiv. 13-17; Deut. ix. 27, 28. This term "reproach" is to be taken as including all that subordination, servitude, degredation and temporary loss of national independence, connected with their stay in Egypt and weary wanderings in the wilderness. During a long series of years, for nearly four centuries, the condition of the Israelites was most abject. Nothing could then have seemed less probable than that they would ever become a distinct and glorious nationality. Previous to the deliverance under Moses their servitude was most cruel and bitter, and the hearts of the people were almost utterly dispirited. And then, during their long sojourn in the wilderness, no doubt the taunts and scornful reproaches of the Egyptians followed them, as if their national divinity had led them thus far, but could do nothing more for them. Had Jehovah not fulfilled his promise, and brought them across the Jordan, as well as through the sea, the "reproach" would have rested on them still. But now, at length, they had actually reached the "other side of Jordan," and the national covenant between God and them had been confirmed afresh. The "reproach of Egypt" was indeed rolled off!

In the Plains of Jericho: This expression is to be noted. Right in front of the chief stronghold of the enemy, they paused for religious worship and instruction. Religion was their first concern. Apparently their position was one of extreme peril. But he, who had delivered, would never leave not forsake them. Trusting in him they felt secure. Stopping to observe this religious ordinance manifested both their confidence and their obedience. Revivals "begin at home," in the church; then the strongholds of iniquity are ready to fall.—Illustrated Bible Studies.

Joshua's Vision: It occurred in front of Jericho. Perhaps he had gone out by night to inspect the situation as Nemehiah did. (Neh. ii. 11-16, 18.)

It would seem to have been the main purpose of this manifestation to give Joshua a sensible and vivid impression of his superior officer. To the day of his death let him never be tempted to think himself as at the head of the armies of Israel, Let him never forget the presence, the look, the voice, the words of his supreme commanding officer, the real "Captain of the Lord's host." Critics have raised the question, Who was this personage? Was he human, angelic, or divine! But one answer it seems to me can be given: Divine; the same who spake to Moses at the bush; the same whose record and description appears in Ex. xxiii. 20-23; 'Behold, I send an angel before thee; beware of him and obey his voice; provoke him not, for he will not pardon your transgressions; for my name is in him.—Prof. Cowles."

Mackey's Encyclopedia.

The Encyclopedia consists of nearly 950 pages. I think that a fifth part would have been sufficient for imparting all necessary Masonic information; for instance, the article, "Altar," fills nearly a whole page, besides which there is one on "Horns." We are informed that altars were used for burning incense, and for burning sacrifices. The altar is not only described, but cheap wood cuts are appended to both articles. On reading those articles one would be impressed with the idea that altars are essential to lodges, and that the custom is ancient and universal. The fact, however, is, in England there are no altars in Masonic lodges, nor did I see any in the two lodges I visited at Leipsic. I think the fashion is exclusively confined to America. It would therefore have been wiser for Bro. Mackey to have dismissed the subject thus: Masonic Altars—an American notion.

I have more than once contended that the Bible is not an ancient landmark. It was doubtless used in lodges when obligating candidates since the Reformation, but that was all. In this, Bro. Mackey, I am pleased to see, agrees with me. He says:

"The history of Masonic symbolism of the Bible is interesting. It is referred to in the MSS. before the revival (1717) as the book upon which the covenant was taken, but it was never referred to as a great light! In the oldest ritual that we have, viz.: of 1724—a copy of which from the Royal Library of Berlin is given by Kraus—there is no mention of the Bible as one of the lights. Preston made it part of the furniture of the lodge, but in rituals of about 1760, it is described as one of the three great lights."

Religion.—"Masonry," he says, "is not Judaism, though there is nothing in it to offend a Jew; it is not Christianity, but there is nothing in it repugnant to the faith of a Christian. . . . In so far, therefore, it cannot become a substitute for Christianity, but its tendency is thitherward."

"There is nothing in it to offend a Jew," says Dr. Mackey, but is it so? Can a Jew acknowledge the holiness of the Sts. John? Can he join in prayer to Jesus Christ? or can he with a good conscience talk about the "lion of the tribe of Judah?" To show that the above phrase means Christ, Mackey, in the article "Tribe of Judah," says: "The phrase 'lion of the tribe of Judah,' when used in a Masonic ritual, referred in its original interpretation to Christ, him that brought life and immortality to light." Dr. Mackey has not a word to say against the American charlatan who first introduced that phrase into the Masonic ritual, nor did he give the slightest intimation that it ought to be removed; on the contrary, he seemed to sanction its perpetuation. After all this, will any deny that Mackey is a humbug? Nor can I approve of his statement, that the tendency is that Masonry will become a substitue for Christianity. . . .

And now for a little more of Bro. Mackey's see-saw notions. In the article, "Old Records," he says: "The early history of Masonry as written by Anderson, Preston, Smith, Calcut, and writers of that generation, was little more than a collection of fables so absurd as to excite the smile of every reader, or bare statement of incidents without any authority to substantiate their genuineness." That is true—every word of it is true—yet, in other articles Bro. M. pretends to believe in "ancient landmarks," in "York rite," in the St. Alban story, etc. In the article, "Kilwinning," he believes the story that Bruce was the founder of the Royal Order of Scotland. It the article, "Robert Bruce," he says: "The legend requires authentication," but in the article, "Royal Order of Scotland," he says: "As to the origin of the order, we have abundant authority both mythical and historical," but the following extract from his article, "Christianizing," will show how well Bro. M. can pretend to know, and not to know. He says:

"The principles of Freemasonry preceded the advent of Christianity, its symbols and its legends derived from Solomon's Temple and from the people even anterior to that. Its religion comes from the ancient priesthood; its faith was that primitive one of Noah. . . . Yet it cannot be denied that since the advent of Christianity, a Christian element has been almost imperceptably infused into the Masonic system, at least among Christian Masons. . . . The Christian Mason therefore, while appreciating and acknowledging the great doctrines taught in Masonry, and also while grateful that these doctrines were preserved in the bosom of the ancient order at a time when they were unknown to the multitudes of the surrounding nations, is still anxious to give them a Christian character, to invest them in some measure with the peculiarities of his own creed, and to bring the interpretations of their own symbolism more nearly home to his own religious sentiments."

"The feeling is an instinctive one, belonging to the noblest aspirations of our human nature; and hence we find Christian Masonic writers indulging in it to an almost unwarrantable excess, and by the extent of their sectarian interpretations materially affecting the cosmopolitan character of the institution."

And so our encyclopædist goes on apologizing for the Christianizers, giving them a mixture of an ounce of blame and a pound of praise. About his apologies I shall say nothing at present; but his historical allusions deserve the highest censure. It is mere humbug on his part to pretend to believe that Masonry was coeval with the Christian advent, or that the Masons retained in the bosoms of their order any higher liberal opinions than those of kindred trades before Anderson's time. Masons were no more superior in olden times, either morally or scientifically, to blacksmiths, carpenters, tailors, etc., than the bricklayer and stonecutters of to-day are to other artisans. Dr. Mackey knows that Anderson introduced what liberal ideas we have, which were afterwards undermined and corrupted by Christian zealots, such as Dunckerly and others in England, which Webb introduced in America and which was afterward improved by St. Jeremy L. Cross, who, I am inclined to believed, added the "lion of the tribe of Judah," and other stuff. Bro. Mackey knows all this, and of what use was it for him to humbug the fraternity with pretended ignorance of these facts?

I can only account for the mixture of truth and error with which the work abounds, by a supposition that Mackey did the job at so much per page; hence it was his interest to fill so many pages, to save time, and to use the brain as little as possible—Hebrew Leader, Dec. 18, 1874.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JAN. 14, 1875.

The Galesburgh Republican comes to us with the installation of the officers of one Chapter and two Masonic lodges in Galesburgh. And the reporter of that paper says, "We compared it (the lodge) with the Bible; divinity seemed attached to one as much as the other." He adds: "The requirements of Masonry would appear to embody religious principles by which we can live lives that will make them loved and respected on earth and acceptable in the sight of heaven." Can it be possible that the trustees of Knox College, and the Christian churches of Illinois, will tolerate the President-elect of Knox College in maintaining his membership in an order which puts itself in impious rivalship of the Bible and salvation by Christ? For, be it remembered, the reporter above but echoes the standard writers of the lodge. If the trustees fail to require of Mr. Bateman an explicit withdrawal from the lodge, they will incur a moral if not a legal forfeiture of funds given to promote the religion of Christ, not its avowed rivals and counterfeits. About $30,000 of those funds were given by Hon. Charles Phelps, for the "equal benefit of the sexes." Is a Masonic President "for the equal benefit of the sexes," whose whole influence is sworn to the lodge which excludes women?

The Ayrshire Weekly (Scotland) contains some bitter attacks by Protestants on Gladstone for alledged Ultramontane sentiments, while he was laboring to disestablish the Irish church, when, of course, he wished to conciliate the Papists. They are unwise.

The Catholic Bishop of Philadelphia (Dr. Wood) addressing the "Catholic Total Abstinence Benevolent Societies," said:

"I give you a timely warning against joining any of the societies I have alluded to. [Applause.] The malice, bitterness, and bigotry of secret societies are well known, though we equally well know that they are practiced under the cloak of benevolence and charity."

This is sound doctrine. But are not convents and nunneries "secret societies," and bigoted? Is not the confessional so secret that the priest confessor keeps secret the crimes of his penitents? Is not Jesuitism, which now runs and rules the Romish church, a sworn secret society, once, and for forty years, suppressed and cursed by the Pope himself?

OUR NATIONAL PRINTING-HOUSE.

Every "important movement, like every family, must have its home. Every local church has its "meeting-house, as well as Romanism its Vatican. The Anti-Corn Law League had its head-quarters, a building at Manchester whence issued annually tons of publications for the English people, and where Cobden sat with his committee. And the vigor of the various Methodist organizations flows largely from their Book-rooms. So of the tract and mission boards. And the National Christian Association ought not, and if it is to succeed, must not be an exception to this general rule.

These considerations have led to Mr. Carpenter's proposition which is reduced to writing, and is thus:

1. To give the National Christian Association full occupancy of a suitable property on Madison street estimated to be worth twenty thousand dollars, when thirty thousand dollars shall be raised additional to his donation. The property has rented as high as $5,000.

2. And when fifty thousand dollars shall be raised, additional to the thirty thousand, so as to make the entire capital of the Printing-House $100,000, he will convey the fee of the property, constituting his donation, to the National Association.

That is to say if the friends of the cause throughout the country will raise eighty thousand dollars, he will give the other twenty, one-fifth of the whole, to make up one hundred thousand dollars for our National Printing-House and Home.

We want it for a national paper.

We want it for a Book and Tract House.

We want in it rooms for prayer and consultation.

We want it for general head-quarters and the office of the National Committee.

We want in it a ladies' parlor for the temperance cause.

We want it to save the Sabbath, the Bible in schools, and human rights against priest-craft and king-craft which are throttling republicanism in Europe; aye, and will throttle popular government while men manufacture religions for men.

In short, we want a general Light-House of Reform, by whose shining men shall see what the founders of American popular government saw, viz., that human society, packed in "degrees" or "orders." guarded by the sword, and distinguished by titles ascending to "master," "monarch" or "pope," is a constitution, not for Christ and liberty, but for anti-Christ and despotism.

Shall we have such a light-house? Political parties will not save us. These took popular government in charge from the Revolution. And now, priests openly boast here than an American President, like a King of Spain, must soon ask the Pope's blessing before taking his seat.

Our churches cannot save us. The lodge is making its way under the altars of the United Brethren and United Presbyterians, and they will soon govern or rend those altars unless aided and sheltered by a national movement. And though State Associations of Congregationalists have voted in condemnation of the lodge for a full quarter of a century, the very ministers who voted those resolutions cannot read and explain them from their pulpits without a tumult among their people.

"Young Men's Christian Associations" cannot save us. That movement does not exclude Freemasons, though it excludes other Unitarians and deists.

Nor will popular education save us. The retiring Superintendent of Common Schools in Illinois, Hon. Newton Bateman, himself a Freemason, teaches that membership in the lodge is necessary to young men wishing to rise in the profession, and his successor-elect is a Freemason. Mr. Bateman has taken the presidency of a college in the center of the State. Thus education in Illinois is in the invisible grip of the lodge, and every aspiring young teacher is taught to look to it for success.

We must teach the people of the United States that there is an issue between Christian civilization and the dark realm of the lodge. And that which wrenched our free institutions from the priest-and-king worships of the Old world would save them in the New.

Mr. Carpenter's proposition is already hailed with gratitude and delight. Bishop Dickson of the United Brethren writes, Dec. 26th:

"Thanks to our good friend Mr. Carpenter for his generous offer. It is like him. Now what the people want to know is, how much of a fund will it require to make that offer good; and then some plan devised by which it can be secured. Whether it be much or little, the friends of the cause should see to it that it be speedily raised, and this element of permannacy added to the work." J. Dickson.

Rev. A. Hard writes Dec. 30, 1874:

"So sad at the death of Hon. Gerrit Smith. I was just writing him to join Mr. Carpenter is sucuring Mr. Carpenter's building to our Association. But he is snatched away. Do let it be done at once. What is to be done to make it sure? Let us know in dollars and cents what must be pledged and paid to make the property certain to the Association. I am good for my part." A Hard.

The National Committee will soon meet and take definite measures concerning it.

THE WHITE LEAGUES AND LOUISIANA TROUBLES.

Our readers generally know that General Sheridan has been sent by General Grant and has taken command of the disturbed Southren States; and that a file of United States troops has taken by their colalrs, and marched out, members claiming to sit as representatives in the Louisiana Legislature. President Grant has, by this vigor of administration, entitled himself to the thanks of the present and coming generations.

The very name White Leagues proclaims these secret bodies to be at war with the 13th, 14th and 15th amendments of the United States Constitution, which are intended to shield the blacks from political proscription. And their merciless war on the lives and property of the negroes proclaims them to be what a writer in Mississippi calls them, "The old Ku-Klux snake with a new skin."

General C. H. Howard stated on his return from a tour South, that the Ku-Klux kept their uniform and disguises in Masonic halls throughout the South, thus proving those gangs of midnight murderers to be Freemason lodges with a new name and disguise. There has, just a few weeks since, been a grand rally of Masons at New Orleans under the name of Knight Templars. The city paid them profound honors, and there was the usual amount of dancing and revelry attendant. And though we have not the names and facts, no one doubts that Ku-Klux and White Leaguers formed a very considerable part of the revellers on that great occasion. And there is as little doubt that the existing rebellion in Louisiana, entered into the deliberations of the grand assemblage of Knight Templars there, and certainly they did not condemn it. The outbreaks followed their meeting but few days.

General Dustin, of Sycamore, Ill., who went out with a command in the 105th Illinois Volunteers and did good service, was in New Orleans attending that meeting of Knight Templars. He is also a member of a Christian church and highly esteemed by his brethren and neighbors.

We respectfully submit to him, and to all Northern Masons, professing Christians, who were at that New Orleans meeting, the following queries:

1. Was that New Orleans meeting of Knight Templars a fit place for children of God? And do you believe Christ approved of your being there and sharing it?

2. Since we know that Ku-Klux and White Leaguers are many of them Masons, were they fit associates for Northern patriots?

3. The papers show that multitudes of those Ku-Klux Templars are now down on Grant and Sheridan who are striving to protect public order and the lives of the blacks; has it not, at least, "the appearance of evil" that you should associate and brother with them?

4. Ought your not, respected brethren, to "come out from among the mand be separate?" Do not God and your country require it?

NOTES.

—Instead of the usual selection from the Anti-masonic literature of a former generation, this week we have substituted one of Masonic character and origin from the pen of Jacob Norton, of Boston, a gentleman well informed in Masonic history, who carries a free lance among the superstitious and conscience-bound Knights of the lodge. It is proposed to publish frequently from current Masonic literature instead of our usual "Forty Years Ago."

—The call for the Ohio State meeting appears elsewhere, and shows, to the honor of the workers who secured the long and strong list of signers, a commendable zeal in that State for the cause. Among the speakers will be Pres. J. H. Fairchild, of Oberlin, Pres. H. H. George, of Geneva, Rev. J. P. Lytle, a well known name to our readers, and E. Booth, M. D., of Crestline. Let there be a host of praying, zealous spirits in Mansfield on the 17th of February to take counsel against the secret foe of our liberties and religion.

—The sequel to the "Willie Lyons" story of last week will be read with interest, and the author, a prominent Baptist of Wisconsin, will have hearty thanks from all for the handsome way he shows up the sophistry of the Standard story. Although he has drawn in part on imagination, his presentation of the main features of the case is entirely legitimate. The story, as published in the Standard, was aimed at the Baptist church in Walworth, Wis., which nobly stands by its testimony against the secret traps of Satan. The Standard seems thus to slyly aid and comfort an ungodly opposition to a testimony for Christ.

—The attention of friends in Michigan and Iowa is called to the letter of the General Agent on the fourth page. It must be seen that, on account of the urgency of the work already laid out in other States, some brother, or brethren who can act with near communication, upon whom is an unction from God and who have the confidence of the brethren, must take up the preliminary work with zeal and faith to complete it. Will such volunteer, or will any county association nominate?

—An editorial, giving in some detail the state of affairs in Louisiana and showing the justness of Gen. Sheridan's famous despatch recommending that the White Leagues be declared and punished as banditti, was prepared for the present number but withheld to make room for communications from the General Agent. This White League business is far more closely connected with Masonry than the Ku-Klux. The evidence of its damning character daily accumulates.

—The town of Bloomville, Delaware Co. N. Y., cast a vote of 180 at the last election. One hundred and thirty-five names of legal voters have been placed on the petition to Congress in that single election district. The county is about 800 Republican majority. Last fall a Freemason was nominated on the ticket of that party for District Attorney. The Democrats nominated an Anti-mason who was elected by some 400 majority. What county or town in these United States can show a better record?

—Mr. Greene has learned from Postmaster General Jewell, of his Masonic connection. In reply to a request for direct information a printed letter was received, signed by Geo. A. Guston, private secretary, stating that Mr. Jewell is a Knight Templar. It is an item of peculiar significance if Mr. Jewell keeps on hand prlnted notes to inform correspondents of his Masonic connection.

Among the late items of grange news may be mentioned the meeting of the National Grange in Charleston, S. C., Feb. 3d.——The State Grange of Iowa has been obliged to borrow $1,500 to meet its expenses; and 1,100 granges in that State are delinquent in their dues. They are wise grangers; wiser still if they repudiate the order. The Master has a salary of $1,200 and $200 for clerk hire; Secretary $1,000 and $400 for clerk. The Buckeye Farmer says that the secretary of the Ohio State Grange asks $5.00 for a list of the granges of the State.

Report of Agents

FOR QUARTER ENDING JAN. 1st, 1875.

Rev. J. P. Stoddard, General Agent, reports for 52 lectures delivered; 28 ½ Cynosure subscriptions obtained; $133.72 collected in the work; $822,50 in pledges obtained on the field; $250 salary for quarter; $106,87 expenses for traveling, postage, etc. Mr. Wm. Givens has been employed by him to lecture a few times in Hendricks county, Indiana. October was spent in Indiana and Ohio. Mr. Stoddard attended the Indiana State meeting, Oct. 28th and 29th. November was spent in Indiana and Illinois. He attended the State meeting in Illinois and did efficient service in securing pledges for the support of our State Agent. December was spent in Indiana, Ohio and New York. He attended the State meeting in New York during last month, and has labored efficiently in arranging for the State meeting in Ohio to be held in February.

Rev. J. T. Kiggins, Indiana State Agent, reports: 88 days spent in the work; 67 lectures given; 78 points visited officially;—Cynosure subscriptions taken; $98.45; cash received $120,46. Cash due for salary for quarter; $55,78 traveling expenses, etc. $77.79 due Jan.; 1st, 1875. Mr. Kiggins has labored in fifteen different counties, some of them widely separated from each other. He has spoken more than twenty-two times a month, and visited officially twenty-six places in a month. This report shows energy and strict attention to business. He has had sickness in his family and his salary when paid is small. We call on all friends in Indiana who can do so to forward money to our treasurer immediately, both to meet the pressing claim of $77.79 now due, and also for the purpose of having something in the treasury for the present quarter. Every dollar sent in for the Indiana work will be used for that work; not for general purposes.

Rev. D. S. CALDWELL, Ohio Agent, has sent in no reports during the last quarter, but has been heard from several times.

Rev. H. H. HINMAN, Illinois agent, reports 47 lectures delivered; 50 meetings attended; 20 Cynosure subscriptions taken; 63 days spent in Association work; $109.61 cash collected; $77.13 traveling expenses, etc. The balance due Mr. Hinman is now in the treasury and will be forwarded.

No monthly reports have been received from the New York State Agent who is directly responsible to the State Association.

We hope the different States will be prompt to support their agents. All money sent expressly for State Agents, is used only for them. Other expenses are paid by funds contributed to the general work. Excepting a balance due the State Agents of Ohio and Indiana, our treasurer states that the National Association has either paid or is ready to pay all accounts due January first. The Cynosure debt is diminishing and with the continued blessing of God, will be cancelled.

Michigan and Iowa desire and ought to have State Agents. Pennsylvania has one, Rev. J. W. Raynor, just entering the field. We bid him welcome and God speed. He sends to all workers in the reform the wish that they may have a happy New Year in their hearts, homes, and noble work. California is calling for an agent. Vermont and Connecticut are hopefully and earnestly at work; also Wisconsin and Missouri are calling for workers. Massachusetts is rousing slowly but surely, while poor Louisiana is calling on the Knights Templar to prove that her people are a law-loving, law-abiding, citizens. She is a fair examplification at present of the kind of prosperity that secret societies produce.

Resolutions of the Boston Amendment Convention.

The late Convention for the Religious Amendment in Boston, set forth hat cause in a very clear and logical manner through the appended resolutions. They were drawn up by a committee consisting of Judge E. H. Bennett, Prof. of Law in the Boston University, chairman, Revs. H. M. Parsons, D. M. Fall, C. E. Tower, and J. Hogg, and Geo. C. Shattuck, M. D. Our readers will find the main arguments for the proposed amendment here stated in brief but comprehensive form:

RESOLUTIONS.

WHEREAS, This nation was founded by Christians, who incorporated the principles of Christianity into the institutions of the country; and

WHEREAS, Unsectarian Christianity has always been a part of our common law; and

WHEREAS, Our written National Constitution, though made by and for a Christian people, is destitute of any explicit acknowledgement of God or Christianity, which defect is made the pretext of the most dangerous assault on the Christian institution, and usages of our nation; therefore,

Resolved, That the connection which has hitherto existed and still exists, in fact, between our Government and Christianity now demands expression in our fundamental law.

Resolved, That such an expression and authentication of the connection of our Government with Christianity is now required in order fully and explicitly, to harmonize our National Constitution with our State Constitutions, with our common law, and the Christian usages of our common life.

Resolved, That this recognition of Christianity in the National Constitution does not involve a union of church and state, but rather the opposite, since it more clearly enables the nation to express its own relation to Christianity without the intervention of any church organization.

Resolved, That as the Christian institutions of this nation do not infringe upon the rights of any class of citizens, but are the bulwark and safeguard of all rights, the securing for these institutions an explicit legal basis in our fundamental law can be in no manner intolerant or proscriptive.

Resolved, That while it is not the province of civil government to enforce religious worship or observances, this constitutional recognition of the connection of our Government with Christianity is necessary, not to sustain the Christian religion, but to aid in preserving and maintaining the Christian institutions and usages of our nation.

Resolved, That the arguments and reasons for an explicit recognition of the Supreme Being in our several State Constitutions apply with equal force to such an acknowledgement in the Constitution of the United States; and if expedient and proper in the former, it seems no less so in the latter; and if the existence of such provisions in our State Constitutions for so many years, has not tended towards a union of church and state, or the establishment of any sectarian religion, there is no just ground to apprehend such a result from its adoption in our general Constitution.

Resolved, That recognizing the importance of this subject, we pledge ourselves to present and advocate it, until this nation shall declare its Christian character, as it has, with one consent, already asserted its freedom, in the character of our rights and liberties.

Conference Resolutions.

STONE MILLS, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1874.
Editor Christian Cynosure:

DEAR SIR:—At the Annual Conference of the Methodist church held in Wolcott, Wayne Co., N. Y., in Sept., 1874, the committee on secret oath-bound societies reported the following which was adopted by the conference:

"WHEREAS, We, as a body, still continue to regret the existence of secret oath-bound societies in our land, especially Freemasonry, and believing, as we do, that it is our duty to maintain godliness and oppose all moral evil, we feel that it is our duty to God, the Christian church and humanity at large demands, that we speak out decidedly against it. Therefore,

Resolved, 1st. That we will continue to utter our sincere protest against all secret oath-bound societies.

2d, That we will especially use our influence against much to be dreaded institution of Freemasonry, believing it to be one of the worst, if not the worst, institution in our land.

3d, That we hail with much interest the present Anti-masonic movement in our country, and so far as practicable, we will lend a helping hand to the same.

4th, That we recommend to all professed children of light, and friends of Jesus, that they walk in the light and have nothing to do with these "unfruitful works of darkness."

I believe the time not far off, that our church will take the ground, that it will receive no members that belong to an oath-bound secret society. May the good Lord bless the cause and efforts of this reform and hasten the day when the unfruitful works of darkness shall be swept away.

The Home Circle.

After the Storm.

After the storm, a calm;
After the bruise, a balm;
For the ill brings good, in the Lord's own time,
And the sigh becomes a psalm.

After the drought, the dew;
After the cloud the blue,
For the sky will smile in the sun's good time,
And the earth grow glad and new,

Bloom is the heir of blight.
Dawn is the child of night
And the rolling change of the busy world
Bids the wrong yield back the right.

Under the fount of ill
Many a cup doth fill,
And the patient lip, tho' it drinketh oft,
Finds only the bitter still.

Truth seemeth oft to sleep,
Blessings so slow to reap,
Till the hours of waiting are weary to bear,
And the courage is hard to keep!

Nevertheless, I know,
Out of the dark must grow
Sooner or later, whatever is fair,
Since the heavens have willed it so.

Advance.

Ways of Doing Good.

"I am always being told to be of some use—to do good; but what good can I do?" This is a question often put; not always, it must be owned, with actual intent to set to work, but to suggest, sometimes, that nothing is done, simply because nothing is practicable; but, we may well believe, also put sincerely by some who have true intentions if they could only see how to make a beginning.

Now settle in your mind, dear friend, if you be an honest inquirer, that, whatever difficulties may appear, God means you to do good. Read Hebrews xiii. 16, and think it over: "But to do good, and to communicate, forget not: for with such sacrifice God is well pleased." So, I am a priest, ordained to offer sacrifices; namely, the doing of good and communicating; and God, my God, will be pleased with them; and he is in earnest about it; sees that I may forget it, and sets his 'N. B., at it—'forget not.'"

So you will say, if you know yourself to be, through faith in Jesus, of the holy priesthood.

Still the question recurs, "What can I do?" Much will depend on your age, sex, condition, advantages, the number and kind of talents God has put into your hand. You must consider these, and lay out your capital to the best advantage. Let us mention some fields; and you can consider if there be any one of them you could cultivate.

Your own family. Are all its members godly? Have they all a place in the church? No? Then you have a work at your door. Pray; reflect; look for the side on which you can bring help. There is a child not receiving any teaching. There is a want of religious reading even for Sunday. The child could be got to school. A good serial could be got to tempt the careless to read. There is no regular attendance at church. Could you manage to get this arranged? There are servants in the house? Are they Christian? or do you know anything about them? Inquiry even might do good. Try all ways at home. A light is brightest to those who are closest to it.

Your relations, how is it with them? Are they Christians? All? Some are not, not even being approached. Can you approach them, with affection, gentleness, at the right time, and in the right way? Do you live so that they will respect you, and attach weight to what you say? Do you carry yourself so that they love you? You are the very person of all others perhaps to bring the truth to a cousin, an aunt, a nephew. Remember how Joseph provided bread for his brethren and their household, ill as they treated him. "Forget not."

Who lives next door? Are those neighbors to whom you bow on the steps, Christians? Have they a pastor? Do the children learn saving truth? When they are sick do you show them the gentle side of Christianity—that which it turns to the suffering? Do you offer any comfort in sorrow? They know you to be a Christian, perhaps. They must wonder that you have no care for their souls. Perhaps they think your religion is only a form. You will be, and they will be, at the judgment-day. What will there be to look back on of effort made for them?

In what congregation do you worship? Is the minister ever cast down? Are all the committees full and in good spirits? Is there any part of the work falling behind? Could you help it on? You have some place already. Do you fill it effectively? Do you readily "take hold?" Are you doing your work with your might? "Forget not."

"Ah! but," you say, "It is so hard to do these things: it requires a sacrifice." Just so. The Lord knows that. He says so: "With such sacrifice God is well pleased." "Forget not."

"But I am not able to give out; and this needs constant giving out." Just so. He says that. "To do good and to communicate." to give of yours to others; to have fellowship with them, to go on their level to raise them to yours, to be like Him who stooped from the heights and purity of heaven to dwell among unbelieving, scoffing, persecuting foes, to do them good, to give his life for them, to be their sacrifice through which they might have atonement and life; to save such as you—to save you. This is what the Lord means when he says to you—may it ring in your ears and echo in your hearts evermore.—"Forget not."

—John Hall.

Robert Hall.

Robert Hall was a conspicuous man in his day, and we hear more of him than of the thousands of his generation. And therefore, though his name is deservedly celebrated, it has a fame which is exaggerated at the expense of the many whose aggregate beneficence was greater than his. He is praised, they are passed in silence; he is quoted, they are forgotten. Yet it is pleasant to read of his character and life, learning thereby what God sometimes does for an individual, and how he can make him instrumental in accomplishing much good. It is good, also, as by the frailties of the men we see how He warns the world from an idolatry that would be sure to worship a spotless distinction.

Though almost a dwarf in infancy, he grew strong and vigorous in boyhood, and became almost a prodigy in study and intellectual acquirement. He would spend the play hours in study, hidden among trees or away in obscure rooms, reading books of thought and solidity, so that before he was nine years of age, he had repeatedly read Edwards on the "Affections" and the "Will," and "Butler's Analogy." In the same way, he wrote essays, delivered speeches, exhorted and preached, displayed both a taste and talent for exact thought and cultivated language. Usually a youthful prodigy is a subject of disease, and the good and smart children die young, because their precocity was but the sign of their illness. But, as with a few others, Mr. Hall's childish superiority was genius. He lived to fulfil the promise of his boyhood.

In his earlier ministry, he was disposed to stray away from the evangelical faith, and was frequently remonstrated with by his friends who knew his ability and feared his loss. Of a bold and vigorous mind, fond of such intellectual struggles as came in his way, and pleased with the literature of great men among the liberals, he fell into a kind of Socinianism, and then into materialism, and finally stood beside the "awful gulf" of infidelity itself. Weaker minds are subject to the same vagaries, but with them it is generally affectation. Mr. Hall was honest. His questions were those of an earnest soul, led astray, perhaps, by a disposition not sufficiently under the restraints of the grace of God. At this juncture, he was fortunate in having judicious advisers, who remonstrated with him in kindness, warning him of danger, and pleading with him not to forsake or compromise the Gospel of the Saviour. A harsher course might have driven him into rebellion, and made him an enemy of the truth he afterwards so grandly defended. Sometimes good "fathers" pounce upon young men of whom they are suspicious with a severity that frets, irritates, and drives them into a hatred of that which they wanted to love and cherish. A tender hand, a gentle word, should be used with one who struggles in doubt, and feels about for help and safety.

As nearly as we can gather from his memoirs, he was a man of agreeable character, commending his teaching by a pleasant and attractive life. In argument he was impetuous. His contempt of sham and affectation made him very severe on those who practised them. His feelings were strong, and he used language which suited them,—language full of strength and emphasis. But he was kind, tender and affectionate; and if not naturally gentle, he became so by the effect of religion on his soul, and the culture of constant care. In all his words we see his cheerfulness. Even when discussing the most solemn subjects, there is a hearty elasticity, which illustrates the fact that his mind was free from acerbity or morbid meditation. For the blessing of a cheerful spirit any one may be thankful. It saves him from many a pain and pang, and filling him with a perpetual joy, carries him along happily in a way that is crowded with pilgrims of melancholy and foreboding. It makes him also a minister of brightness to all whom he meets,—a real light bearer for the hearts which are settling the shadows of a troubled life.

It is not quite easy at this day to tell what made Mr. Hall the great preacher that he was. His sermons are interesting and instructive, though not half so much so as those of men of less fame, and there is no description of him that gives us satisfactory information. He had read largely and had made assimilation of what he thus acquired; he had a good imagination, and was strongly logical, but he was lacking in many of the artistic traits of oratory. No one would have chosen him as a teacher of elocution. The rules of the rhetoricians he defied, and in all his public efforts he seemed to be utterly unconscious of trying to succeed or doing anything remarkable. Perhaps his deep feeling was his first great quality. The subjects under his discussion took hold of his mind and became parts of himself; he forgot his appearance, his congregation, his surroundings,—every thing in the passion of the exercise; and thus pouring out his soul in the use of a strong and beautiful language, he literally carried away all who heard him. His oratory was that of intense earnestness,—the natural gush of a great soul all on fire. His voice was weak, and he spoke on a high key. The rapidity of his utterance was surprising. When a boy, he had the reputation of being a rapid speaker, and this grew on him in after life. Soon after beginning to preach, he said, "For me to speak slow is ruin." Explaining this philosophically, he said, "You know, sir, that force or momentum is conjointly as the body and velocity; therefore, as my body is feeble, what is wanted in body is made up in velocity, or there will not be, cannot be any impression."

From early life Mr. Hall was a sufferer from a pain in his back. It increased with the years, often interrupting his studies and preventing his discharge of duty, and always giving him more or less of discouragement. For twenty years he could not remain a whole night in bed. Two hours of sound sleep was all he could secure, after which he would lie on the floor or chairs, or fix himself in some horizontal position. Towards the end of his life he lived in agony, when attacked by his paroxysms. Nothing could cure him, nothing would alleviate the misery, and he struggled on, in patience and trust, looking for a release in the painless world of the future.

Some time before his marriage, he was afflicted with mental trouble which threatened to put an end to his usefulness. Being a close student, an intense plodder at his books, and a man of great undertakings and industry, he shut himself up too closely, and became a victim to his imprudence. Sleepless nights, succeeded by busy and exhausting days, soon brought his glory to the dust. Loving scenery, the hills and vallies, and all that is beautiful in nature, it was only to look at, but not to cultivate by actual contact and communion.

Although Dr. Hall was so great and good a man, it is not impossible that he increased his pain and shortened his life by his bad habits. In his earlier years, he called smoking "an odious custom," and strongly censured those who indulged in it. But becoming familiar with Dr. Parr, he also became familiar with his vice of using tobacco, and learned to smoke, as he expressed it, in self-defense. Having read an article against "The Use and Abuse of Tobacco," by Dr. Adam Clark, he said, "I can't refute his arguments, and I can't give up smoking." On being rallied for falling into such a habit, he replied, "O sir, I am qualifying myself for the society of a doctor of divinity; and this," holding up the pipe, "is my test of admission." And thus the bold original, independent, strong man became a slave, and formed what his biographer calls "his most inveterate habit." After this, tobacco, with opium and tea, was his sedative, his solace and intoxicant. Pain, worry, anxiety, were all stuffed in the pipe, and sent ff in smoke. When boys learn to smoke, we can understand it. It is a youthful folly, for which they are mostly very sorry in after life. When weak-minded men begin it, we feel the lack of sense presupposed, a sensual indulgence; but when a great and good man like Dr. Hall takes to smoking, we almost lose our faith in the dignity of human nature.—Evangelical Repository.

Blessed are the Peacemakers.

This benediction, in illuminated letters, should be framed in gold and hung upon the walls of every household. Were it engraved in every heart how soon this world would become heaven, for the quality of this beatitude, like that of mercy, is not strained:

".....it is twice blessed;
It blesseth him that gives and him that takes."

Every family needs its peacemaker, one who, forgetting self, seeing clearly the right, can see also through others' eyes, harmonize conflicting views, melt discords into music, charm away the mists of ignorance, misapprehension, and selfishness, and bring all where they can see eye to eye and their hearts vibrate to one touch of sympathy.

Could those at variance in the same household be taken into each other's consciousness, how often would pity and compassion take the place of distrust and dislike. We think a friend cold, indifferent, ill-natured, when perhaps he is burdened with a secret sorrow he may not unfold. Every heart has its load of care and grief, of disappointment and of pain, which will at some time make itself manifest. The peacemaker must often wound in order to heal, must kindly set the wrong of the erring one in a clear and strong light, that he may mend his ways and study the things that make for peace. When this is done in the right spirit and received in the right spirit, how blessed are the results.

Every social circle needs its peacemaker. Our interests often seem to conflict with those of our neighbors, though they are in reality one, and he who seeing this can bring all to see it and act accordingly is a universal benefactor. The root of gossip, scandal, backbiting is selfishness in some one of its protean forms of envy, jealousy, malice, hatred. When each loves his neighbor as himself the peacemaker's vocation will be gone, but until then there is work for us all to do. "He who has the spirit of perpetual kindness, the disposition at all times to promote the happiness and to be lenient to the defects of others, to harmonize adverse interests and conciliate oposing elements often does good when he knows not of it. He is among men like the showers that pass over the earth, which, falling somewhere, sometimes may fall on the desert, but more often on the soil that needs and is prepared for them. A virtue goes out from him which heals those who unwitnessed touch the hem of his garments. He whose trouble is unknown to all save himself and God, has his spirit often soothed and brightened by a friendly act or friendly words from one who is as ignorant as all others of the secret trouble. The kind and considerate spirit cheers despondency and encourages wavering consciences, often when it does not suspect their existence. Such is the power and the reward of true kindness." "Blessed are the peacemakers, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."—N, Y. Tribune.

Years of Cold in Europe.

The recent severe cold weather calls to remembrance the following facts, which appeared in the Journal des Debats:

In 379 A. D., the Euxine was frozen over.

In 508 the rivers of England were frozen over for two months.

In 558 the Black sea was covered with ice for 20 days, and in 763 the ice was 89 feet thick.

In 821 the Elbe, the Danube, and the Seine were frozsn during four weeks.

In 1323 the Mediterranean was entirely frozen.

In 1405 Tamerlane made an incursion into China, and lost his men, horses, and camels by the excessive cold.

In 1420 Paris experienced so grea cold that the city was depopulated, and animals fed on corpses in the streets.

In 1433, at Paris, snow fell during forty days and forty nights incessantly.

In 1469, in France and Germany, wine was frozen so hard that it was cut in blocks and sold by weight.

In 1570 the intense cold lasted three months, and all the fruit trees of Provence and Languedoc were destroyed.

In 1607 provisions and fuel became so scarce on account of cold in Paris that a small bundle of kindling-brush cost 40 cents. The cattle froze in their stalls and the Seine could be crossed by heavy carts.

The year 1709 was one of intense cold all over Europe, and mass could not be said for many weeks in certain provinces, because the wine could not be kept in a fluid state.

In 1735, in Chinese Tartary, the thermometer fell ninety-seven degrees below zero—Fahrenheit.

1740 was a winter of such rigor in Russia that an ice palace was constructed at St. Petersburg 51 feet long and 17 feet wide. Six ice cannons were mounted on the walls and two mortars for bombs. The cannon held balls of six pound weight, were charged with powder, and discharged, so that the ball pierced a board two inches thick at a distance of 60 feet. The cannon did not burst, though its walls were less than ten inches in thickness.

1765 was a year of intense cold, also 1788. Since that year the cold has never been so great in Paris until the year 1871, when, for the first time in a century, Jack Frost came again to the tune of 21 below zero centigrade.

Children's Corner.

Trifles! Trifles!

"Don't," said the pony to the flies, and he shook his head and lashed his tail about, and away they all flew.

"Don't, I say," he cried again, moving to another place, where he hoped he should lose them. And so he did for a minute or two, but no longer. There they were—in his eyes, on his nose, at his ears, and all over him.

If he could have eaten them all, he would, or kicked them into the next county, he would, or galloped them out of the world, he would; but there was no doing anything with them. As he moved they moved; and every time he attempted to graze they settled themselves on him, or buzzed in a cloud round his head, as regularly as if they had come by invitation.

"Oh, dear!" he sighed at last, "what is to be done? I can bear my master's whip and spur; I can stand being half worked to death over the country, and with the heavy cart—those are evils I make up my mind to, and if that yelping cur comes behind me, I can give him a reception that sends him flying; but as to these torments, contemptible as they are—too small to be met effectually—I verily believe they'll be the death of me!"

Ah! so it is in human life as in pony life. Great trials can often be bravely borne, when petty annoyances, by number and pertinacity, vex and wear the soul.—Sel.

Japanese Children.

The Japanese children have to endure hardships from their birth. In their tiny houses are no bright, cheerful fires, no easy chairs, no well-spread tables, around which the family gather, and hold sweet converse. You must stoop to enter the ordinary houses, and their rooms are not much larger than closets. A part of the floor is covered with mats on which they sit and sleep. A block of wood, four inches high, hollowed a little at the top, answers as a pillow. Sometimes it has stuffing on top an inch thick, over which a clean piece of paper is spread each time it is used, to save any needful washing. The head poised on this pillow, prevents the disarrangement of the hair, so that it need not be combed more than once or twice in a week. But the poor babies and the little children's heads are shaved entirely, or have from one to five tufts of hair left on the top, over each ear, and on the back. I have seen little babies, with heads entirely shaven and uncovered on the coldest day, while the mother or person on whose back it was carried, had the face and head covered, only the eyes and nose visible. Dr. Hepburn says, "Only very strong babies survive their infancy."

Japanese houses have only paper windows; they have no stoves or grates, but a little box, from one to two feet square, with some coals in the centre, is all they have for warmth or cooking. Two or three cups, as many plates, a tea-pot, a kettle, and some boxes to hold their clothing, complete their furniture. All the houses I have seen are very clean, which is their only appearance of comfort.

Little children are often made to take care of the baby. A very common sight is a little boy or girl, from five to twelve years old, playing with a kite, with a baby strapped on their back, fast asleep, but sometimes crying. In the latter case, they only say, "Be quiet," and go on with their play. But Japanese children seldom cry or quarrel, and are very obedient to parents and teachers whom they venerate.—Missionary Link.

The Origin of Plants.

Madder came from the East. Celery originated in Germany. The chestnut came from Italy. The onion originated in Egypt. Tobacco is a native of Virginia. The nettle is a native of Europe. The citron is a native of Greece. The pine is a native of America. Oats originated in north Africa. The poppy is a native of the East. Rye came originally from Siberia. Parsley came from Sardinia. The pear and apple are from Europe. Spinach was first cultivated in Arabia. The sun-flower was brought from Peru. The mulberry tree originated in Persia. The gourd is probably an Eastern plant. The walnut and peach came from Persia. The cucumber came from the East Indies. The quince came from the Island of Crete. The radish is a native of China and Japan. Peas are supposed to be of Egyptian origin. The garden cress is from Egypt and the East. Horse-radish came from Southren Europe. The Zealand flax shows its origin by its name.

"Yes," and "No;" or "Yes, Sir," and "No, Sir."

Some time ago a London merchant wanted a boy in his warehouse. Two were recommended to him. The first boy walked into the counting-house keeping his cap on his head, which was not very polite.

In answer to questions, the boy abruptly answered "Yes," or "No."

The second boy made a polite bow when he entered, and when asked a question replied with "Yes, sir," "No sir," etc. The first boy was the stronger, and was, therefore, better able to carry more parcels about than the other.

Yet did the merchant select this one? Oh! no—the boy who took off his cap got the situation.

News of the Week.

The City.

The exhibit of the trade and commerce of Chicago for 1874 is very satisfactory, taking into account the continued depression in business of nearly all kinds on account of the panic of 1873. In the produce trade there was an increase of 13 1–4 per cent. over 1873. There was received 7,056,000 tons during the year or 10 4–10 tons every minute. Of this vast amount were breadstuffs, 95,208,000 bushels; cattle, 843,966; live hogs 4,258,379; and 1,053,809,158 feet of lumber. The wholesale trade foots up to $267,000,000 total sales, being an increase of 10 per cent. Manufactures show a falling off of 6 1–3 per cent. and a total footing of $154,800,000. The total trade of the city amounted to $639,000,000 an increase of 7 1–4 per cent. over the previous year.

Legislative.

There has been a general firing off of eloquence over affairs in New Orleans in all the State Legislatures now convened. The Democratic party are not likely to make many friends in the end by their treatment of the case.——The Illinois Legislature has organized with a Democratic chairman in each body. A. A. Phelps, who is elected in the House is a Freemason.——In Congress Colonel Thomas Scott has made an argument before the House Committee on the Pacific Railroad in favor of aid to the Texas Pacific Railroad. The whole subject was referred to a special committee.——Senator Morton is engineering a bill to change the mode of electing the President and Vice-President of the United States.——Several days have been spent in discussing Louisiana affairs. The President is denounced in no measured terms for the present condition. Schurz has spoken strongly against federal usurpation. The President has prepared a statement which he will give to Congress this week. He will probably show the body how the matter was plainly laid before it nearly two years ago without any action on its part to prevent the murders and troubles now prevalent in Louisiana.——The Pacific Mail Investigation finds that considerable sums were given to members of the press. Col. Forney of the Philadelphia Press received $25,000; Shaw of the Boston Transcript $18,000; Piatt, of the Washington Capital $5,000; and smaller amount to others.

Foreign.

Advises from Central Asiatic Turkey state that the pressure of famine is lessening somewhat. In the villages a portion of the people have grain from last summer's crop. Others, however, in the villages, and a still greater number in the towns, have none, and speculators hold supplies at ruinous prices. The Protestant church at Cesarea is receiving aid from Scotland. There is also help coming from America, but more will be required to save the Protestant communities from extinction.——Two facts suggestive of the new order of things about to be introduced in Spain under King Alfonso are mentioned. Castelar, almost the only great man the country has developed for generations, is preparing to leave the country on the advent of Alfonso; and two Protestant newspapers have been suppressed at Madrid. These events are significant of the future policy of the government—political and intolerance. The German government it is said has refused to recognize the new order of things in Spain until these papers are restored, and also the Protestant chapel at Cadiz, which has been closed by the new authorities, is re-opened. Don Carlos, who is cousin of the King, has issued a proclamation maintaining his right to the throne and affirming his intention to fight for it.——Valmaseda, the "bloody butcher," who shot the student boys at Santiago two years since, has been returned to Cuba as Captain-General.——The National Assembly of France failing to support the ministry, that body resigned last week. MacMahon is now looking up a new cabinet with difficulty.

Religious Intelligence.

—The venerable Rev. Henry Boehm, (Methodist), son of Martin Boehm, one of the founders of the church of the United Brethren in Christ, lacks only about six months of being one hundred years old. He is spending the winter in Jersey City with his children. On a recent Sunday he read through the entire book of Revelation.

—The Abbe Michaud, it is reported, is soon to come over from France to inaugurate the old Catholic movement in this country. He has been repeatedly urged to this step. If this should be done we might expect a great fluttering among the adherents of the Pope. It is thought that many Romanists here are ripe for the movement.

—The Adventists who usually hold a camp-meeting at Alton Bay, New Hampshire, have divided within the past year. The new party calls itself "Timists," and have fixed the date of the end of the world May 1, 1875.

—Dr. L. F. C. Tischendorf, the well known biblical scholar, is dead. He was in the sixtieth year of his age. His discovery of the manuscript of the New Testament in the convent at Mt. Sinai marked an era in textual criticism. He died at Leipsic, Germany, Dec. 1st, being at the time professor of Theology and Biblical Literature in the University of that city.

—The Old Catholics are about to establish themselves in London. A formal organization of a congregation is soon to take place. This is one of the fruits of the Gladstone-Manning controversy. Lord Acton and others, who recognize allegiance to the Queen, and who are Catholics, will undoubtedly favor the movement. The doctrine of the first seven Ecumenical Councils is to be the standard of belief.

—The late Dr. Joel used to say that his style of preaching was moulded by the criticisms of Dr. Emmons on a single sermon. Dr. Hawes read a paper to his tutor exuberant with rhetoric. "Joel," said the sage, "I kept school once. When I punished the boys, I always stripped the leaves off the rod," drawing his imaginary rod through the fingers.

—The day of fasting and prayer appointed by of the churches of Chicago on Friday last was observed to a considerable extent. The all-day meeting was held in Farwell Hall, was well attended and maintained a good degree of interest and devotional spirit all day. The main floor of the Hall was well filled. Pastors Goodwin and Mitchell, Bishop Cheney, Majors Whittle and Cole conducted the meeting which was divided into hours, a new subject being under consideration each hour from 9 to 4 o'clock. It is confidently hoped that this and other special meetings held in connection will be greatly useful in advancing true spiritual religion among the churches and the whole city will feel the effect.

—Rev. D. McAllister, agent of the National Reform Association, whose labors have been remarkably efficient in furthering the the Religious Amendment reform, has accepted a call from the Reformed Presbyterian church in Walton, N. Y., to take effect in May next. Mr. McAllister will continue to give attention to the reform work.

General.

The third annual meeting of the Illinois State Farmers' Association will be held at Cook's Hall, in the city of Springfield, commencing Tuesday, Jan. 19, 1875, at 9 o'clock. A. M. and continuing three days ——Charles Conroy, the assailant of Mr. Anthony Comstock, special agent of the New York Post Office, who has done so much to suppress immoral publications, has been sentenced to two years in the New Jersey State Prison and to pay a fine of $500 and costs.——Chauncey Rose, of Terre Haute, Ind., has made a donation of $356,000 to institutions of that city: to the School of Industrial Science, $206,000, and to the Vigo County Orphan's Home, $150,000. He has before given large sums in benevolence and charity, including $100,000 to the Ladies' Aid Society of that city; $50,000 to Wabash College, and a large sum to charities in New York.——An arrangement made with the Canadian Government took effect Jan. 1st, whereby postal communication is made free between the two countries. Mail will go to all parts of Canada at the same rate as in the States. For letters this provision takes effect Feb. 1st.——The fire caused by the collision on the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad, near Washington, on Thursday night, destroyed the Northern mail, including the accumulated day's mail from the South, $400,000 in new national bank notes, and several packages of important Government letters. A postal clerk was crushed by the collision.——After an examination of 1,500 candidates a jury was found for the Tilton-Beecher case last week, and the trial opened on Monday with a long array of legal talent. This is the civil suit brought by Tilton.—Kinsella, a friend of Beecher, must pay $15,000 damages to Field, Superintendent of Brooklyn, schools, for adultery with Mrs. Field, and two divorce suits are pending.

Home and Health Hints.

The Care of the Eyes.

The necessity of taking proper care of these delicate and serviceable organs is rarely recognized fully until they begin to fail. Then pounds of cure fails to do what ounces of prevention could easily have accomplished. Now that during so many of our waking hours we must depend for light upon artificial means, and so many thousands of students and working people use their eyes all the long evening, a few statements bearing on this subject will be timely and may be profitable. There are times when much exertion of the eyes is more hurtful than at others. Immediately after a full meal, when the blood is required in the stomach for purposes of digestion, not the eyes only, but the brain, the muscles, the whole body should rest. Compression of the throat, the chest and the feet act injuriously upon the eyes; therefore, if to meet the demands of senseless fashion, tight neckcloths, corsets and shoes must be worn in society, they should we laid aside when the pen, the needle or the book is taken in hand. After great bodily fatigue, or during mental distress, late at night when one is sleepy, or after a sleepless night, the eyes should not be taxed. It is common for convalescents to read much during their recovery. In this way the term of convalescence is prolonged and the eyes sometimes permanently injured. Young, growing persons, especially those just arriving at the age of puberty, need to be very careful how they use their eyes. As far as possible they should study only by sunlight, and when they have been refreshed by a night's sleep, rather than after the fatigue and confinement of the school hours.

In reading, the more closely the eye is confined to the page the more it is strained. Works of science and history, which require thought and so give the eyes rest while they are being read, are less straining to the vision than is novel reading which does not compel the removal of the eye from the page. Reading from a broad page, in which the lines are long and the print is small, is very fatiguing, as it is difficult for the eye to take up the next line. Writing is easier for the sight than reading, but copying is harder than either reading or writing. Reading when in motion, in cars, on steamboats or on horseback, is very trying to the eyes because of the instinctive effort of the eye to maintain a steady focus when it is continually changing.

The management of light is of very great importance. So far as we may, we should imitate the example of the great Architect, and have our chandeliers suspended from the ceilings or so that the light will fall on our work from above. When lamps must be placed so as to shine directly into the eye, shades should be used to soften the light. Lamp globes made of glass, slightly blued with ultramarine, are very desirable, as they absorb the yellow and orange rays which are invariably found in artificial light and transmit that which resembles the pure white light of the sun.

Both eyes when used should be equally exposed to the light; the frequent practice of reading and sewing with one's side toward the window or the lamp is very injurious; light should come slantingly over the shoulder or be so shaded that the eye shall not suffer from its brilliancy. When the eyes are weary great relief is experienced by closing them for a few moments or by looking at objects at a distance.

A flickering light is very trying to the eye. One reason why the eyes can do so much more work without fatigue by day than by night is because the action of sunlight is equable and unvarying. But in artificial illumination, as it is impossible perfectly to regulate the supply of air and of combustible material, the light is flickering and unsteady. The most constant and unchanging flame is produced by the glass chimney of the Argand burner. If the eye is shaded from the direct rays of this lamp, the intensity of the light may be much reduced and consequently the strain on the nerve of vision considerably lessened.

In sleeping rooms the beds should be so placed or the windows so shaded that the eyes will not open in the morning on the full light of day or even on bright rays of light streaming in through crevices in the window shutter. A multitude of washes and ointments are used to cure sore eyes. It is safe to let all these things entirely alone unless they are prescribed by a professed oculist, and devote one's energies to improving the general health. Nothing should touch the eye but tepid soft water, unless ordered by the physician. A fruit diet, out-of-door exercise, a clean skin, warm feet and entire cessation from all reading and sewing will often cure sore eyes.

Temperance.

A Million Signatures Wanted.

The committee of the Woman's National Temperance Union have issued the following memorial to Congress which should be everywhere circulated. Petitions should be sent early this month to Annie Wittenmyer, 1020 Arch St., Philidelphia.

To the Hon. Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, of the United States of America, in Congress assembled:

We, the undersigned members of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, and others, in view of the imbecility, insanity, pauperism, suffering and crime, resulting from the use of alcoholic drinks, pray your Honorable Body for such restrictive legislation as shall limit the importation, manufacture, and use of alcohol, to the arts and to mechanical, chemical and medical purposes, in the District of Columbia, and the Territories. And we will continue to pray.

TEMPERANCE.—A powerful effort will be made to introduce and pass a new anti-temperance bill in the next legislature in Indiana, granting license to sell intoxicating liquors upon payment of $50, and limiting the jurisdiction over violations to justices of the peace. This would allow one-half of those who otherwise would be arraigned to go unwhipped of justice.

Gerrit Smith's Appeal to a Boy on Tobacco.

MY DEAR GEORGE:—I could have wept the other day when I saw you smoking a cigar. Only fourteen years old, and already at work to poison your soul with tobacco! Oh, this is sad indeed! My dear boy, you see not what is before you. If you did, you would be appalled, and you would fall on your knees, and entreat your heavenly Father to save you from the wasteful, filthy, wicked practice of using tobacco.

Do not excuse yourself by saying that some great and good men use tobacco. The great and good men who do so are in danger of sinking into very little and very wicked men before they die.

Tobacco and rum! What twin brothers! What mighty agents of Satan! What a large share of the American people they are destroying! I love my children; and because I love them, I had rather bury them than see them defile themselves with rum and tobacco.

As Paul said to Timothy, so say I to you: "Keep thyself pure." Be clean in your person and be clean in your heart. But, depend upon it, you can be neither if you use tobacco.

Facts and Figures.

—Kalakaua's income is $22,500 per annum, and he could have more, but he declines on account of the poverty of his subjects. Their tax is five cents on every $100; $1 on every horse, and $5 on every carriage owned and run.

—M. Henri Robert claims to be the original inventor of a curious clock, which consists simply of a transparent glass dial suspended by two cords from points in its border. It has the two usual hands, but these are apparently free from any machinery to carry them. If either be moved and then let go it returns to its former position after a few oscillations. The hands are really moved by mechanism within them by means of which their center of gravity is continually displaced.

—Immigration has fallen off for the year 1874 about sixty per cent. from the figures of 1873—from 159,247 to 97,623; nor is this the whole difference. Re-emigration has taken back not far from half as many as have come. The reason for this is the scarcity of labor, failure of crops, etc., here; and the increased prosperity, order and confidence in Germany. We do not regret this. Foreigners were coming faster than we could assimilate them. It will be better for them, and for us all, that we are allowed to get the present stock properly arranged. Skilled labor is scarce in Germany and the prices paid exceed anything that has been paid for years past. Book-binders, machinists, type-setters, and mechanics in the different trades are receiving from 10 to 30 florins a week where only one-third that used to be paid. This rate, considering the prices of rent, provisions, and living generally, is equivalent to as many dollars here. Accomplished book-keepers with large manufacturing companies are receiving from 3,000 to 10,000 florins a year. Business is brisk throughout the Empire, and prosperity and plenty prevail throughout the land. This is accounted for by the fact that while Germany is now homogeneous and a unit, she became enriched by the late war, levying tribute upon France, which was made to bear all the expense of the campaign. She was more than indemnified. Money became plenty and the industries which had slumbered when the war was raging, were set in operation at its close. —Interior.

MASONRY A WORK OF DARKNESS.

A SERMON BY

REV. LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG.

The copy from which this Discourse is printed, was found in the "United and Reformed Presbyterian Pulpit" for December, 1869, and January, 1870, then published at Xenia, Ohio. The following Note was subjoined by the Editors.

NOTE.—Upon the abduction of Wm. Morgan, Sept., 1827, the eyes of the entire country were opened to the true character of the [Masonic] organization, and the dangers to which our country was exposed from it, and many good men, who had been entangled with it, publicly acknowledged its character and withdrew from it. For a time it seemed to have received its death-blow, and thereafter for years received but little attention. But it has been secretly growing and working its way to place and power, until recently its impudence and assumptions have again aroused the fears of Christians and patriots; and the notes of alarm are being sounded not only from Oberlin, but over the length and breadth of the land. The following discourse, though delivered several years ago, yet presents the nature of the institution so clearly and succinctly, and there seems to be so much need of something of the kind, that we cheerfully give it a place in the PULPIT. Should it be said that Masonry has changed since this sermon was delivered, let him who affirms it make good the proof of the same.—EDS.

TEXT.

Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them; for it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret. EPHESIANS, v. 11, 12.

The Works of Darkness comprise all that belongs to the system of moral evil. Opposition to God and holiness, characterizes their nature; the love and practice of them constitute the guilt, and lead to the destruction of mankind. Satan, the first great enemy of God, introduced them into this world, and it is by his special instigation and agency that they still prevail.

Every period of the world has been marked with some peculiar enormity, designed to dishonor God, and to ruin the souls of men. Before the flood, the wickedness of man was great in the earth. Subsequently, idolatry led mankind almost universally, to the violation of the first commandment of that great law of inspiration, "Thou shalt have no other Gods before me." Hence, the ancients worshiped their Apis and Crocodile, Baal and Moloch, Jupiter and Venus, and a host of inferior deities.

At the commencement of the Christian Era, the world was overspread with Paganism, and the various modes of heathen worship constituted the principal religion of mankind. Greece had long been the seat of philosophical literature, and the Eleusinian festivals were the most splendid and popular of all the heathen ceremonies. These were periodically celebrated by the Athenians, in honor of Ceres, the goddess of agriculture, and her daughter Proserpine, who, according to the fabulous legends of heathen mythology, was stolen by Pluto, from the plains of Sicily, and was transported into the infernal regions, where she became queen of the world of darkness. To prepare for the Grand Festivals was the principal object of the schools of philosophy, and the public celebrations were scenes of the most abominable wickedness. We are informed in the history of the ancients, that there were secrets belonging to this heathen festival which were "so superstitiously observed, that if any one ever revealed them, it was supposed he called divine vengeance on his head, and the wretch was put to an ignominious death."

Such abominations were practiced in the apostolic age, and to them the holy apostle, doubtless, had allusion, when he exhorted the Ephesian Christians to "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them;" and to enforce his admonition, added, "For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret."

This apostolic admonition is of universal application, and mankind at this period, as well as in ages past, and especially all professing Christians, are bound to renounce the works of darkness which prevail in the world, of whatsoever kind they may be.

Among the various stratagems of Satan in opposition to God and holiness, and for the purpose of destroying the souls of men, the institution of Speculative Freemasonry holds a pre-eminent rank. Whatever may have been the circumstances of its origin, and the modes of its primary existence, the following are undeniable facts: That the claims of Freemasonry are very extensive; that the long-boasted secrets of its nature are divulged to the world; and that the exposure has proved it to be a work of darkness. As long as Masonry could be kept concealed, the world was unable, successfully, either to dispute its claims, or to oppose its interests. So deep laid, and strongly fortified by its own internal powers of concealment, was the institution of Freemasonry, that no earthly opponent could enervate its influence, derogate from its professed importance, or impede the progress of its usurpation. During the years of its prosperity, it passed in the world as a boasted Mystery of Wonders, unsuspected of possessing means to control the energies of civil, military and ecclesiastical governments; unsuspected of possessing power to take the lives of its members privately for the slightest offense; and unsuspected of being adequate to the work of forging chains to bind a nation in the tyranny of Masonic Despotism.

But the light of Truth has been permitted to shine in the dark recess, and discover to the world the enormity of the Masonic institution. The diabolical enchantment is broken. The mask of disguise which concealed the turpitude of its nature, has been rent assunder; and the fact is notorious that Freemasonry has fallen before the truth, like the Philistine's Dagon before the Ark of the God of Israel. Like the fallen idol, its head and hands are broken off and dashed to atoms. Like those of Judas, its bowels are gushed out; and instead of being the mystical wonder of the world, it has become the contempt of an enlightened public: an object of special abhorrence of many of its once deluded votaries who have renounced it; and every class of community may possess the means of information, become acquainted with its nature and tendency, and judge for themselves whether it be good or bad.

From the revelation which is made of its principles, it is now proposed to prove that the institution of Freemasonry is a Work of Darkness, and that its adherents are bound by the authority of Heaven to renounce it.

I, BECAUSE IT GROSSLY PERVERTS THE HOLY SCRIPTURES.

Many of the names of Masonic signs, and pass-words, and tokens, and professed history of degrees, are taken from the Sacred Writings, and hence the doctrine is palmed upon the world, that Masonry is founded on the Word of God. "Boaz" and "Jachin," "Shibboleth" and "Tubal-Cain," "Joppa," "Markwell," "Jah," "Jehovah," and many other Masonic terms are taken from the Bible, and candidates for Masonic degrees are instructed to believe that Masonry is hence of divine origin, and that its professed sublime principles are in accordance with Divine Inspiration.

That such premises and conclusion constitute a gross perversion of Scripture, must be obvious to every person of serious reflection. By this rule Scripture terms and phrases might be selected, and so mangled as to support the doctrine of systematic infidelity, with all its complicated auxiliaries of falsehood, deception, libertinism and epicurean revelry, in connection with the unrestrained gratification of every vile propensity of fallen nature. To this use of Scripture, Satan resorted when he tempted our Savior in the wilderness. And it would be no less preposterous to conclude, that Satan's principles, and doctrine, and motives were pure, and founded on the Word of God, because he quoted a mutilated passage of Scripture to prove that there would be no danger of falling to the rocks below, if Jesus should cast himself headlong from the pinnacle of the temple in Jerusalem, than to conclude, that because Masonic terms are taken from the Bible, therefore, Masonry is of divine origin.

Freemasonry perverts the Holy Scriptures by introducing Masonic traditions and interpolations, to supply pretended deficiencies of the Bible. Of this description is the lamentable Masonic tragedy of the assassination of Hiram the Widow's son. It is well known to the public, that every candidate for the Master Mason's Degree, is made to personify Hiram, the ingenious artificer, who assisted in building King Solomon's Temple. And because the Scriptures are silent respecting the circumstances of his death, Masonic tradition undertakes to supply this pretended deficiency of the Bible, with a description of the doleful tragedy which constitutes a portion of the sworn secrets of the Masonic institution. The amount of the story is, that Hiram was assaulted by three Fellow-Craft Masons, who demanded of him the Master's Word, on pretense of a journey to some foreign land in quest of Masonic employment. But being refused the word which they demanded, each gave Hiram a blow, the last of which deprived him of life, and the body was concealed in an obscure place under ground To detect the perpetrators, King Solomon, it is said, laid an embargo on all ships sailing from the various ports of his kingdom, to prevent their escape, and by vigilant search the assassins were detected, and brought to justice by suffering the penalty of their Masonic obligation, as an example to deter others from a violation of Masonic rules; and the body of Hiram, when found, was taken from the place of its concealment and Masonically interred under the SANCTUM SANCTORUM of the Temple.

Every candidate for the Master Mason's Degree is taught this lesson of Masonic tradition in a manner, the recollection of which is truly sickening, and must forever be disgusting to every pious mind. After the obligation is taken, by which the candidate is Masonically sworn to keep secret forever, every point of the degree, a farce is introduced, in which the candidate is made to represent and personify Hiram in the various scenes of his pretended assassination, concealment, and subsequent Masonic interment. Thus, he is hoodwinked and led around the professed "Sanctum Sanctorum," (the name of every Lodge-Room,) for the proof of his fidelity. A Masonic prayer is made for his success, and a portion of the Scriptures read, to prepare his mind for the awful scene of falling a victim to the vengeance of aspiring disappointed villains. Unsuspecting any danger, the candidate is violently seized, and demanded to give the Master's Word on peril of death in case of refusal. Of this "word" the candidate is himself yet ignorant. His conductor pleads in vain for a postponement, until the word can be Masonically obtained. The pretended assailant, (who is an officer of the Lodge,) affects to be in a rage, and gives the candidate a blow with a Masonic implement. Passing onward a little farther, the candidate is again assaulted by another wretch, who makes the same demand, and on refusal, gives him another blow. But the mortal wound is reserved for the assassin called Jubelum, who, in a rage, for the same cause as above, gives the blind candidate a blow on the head with a small leather mallet stuffed with wool, at which instant he it twitched backward into a sheet, wrapped up, and dragged into a corner of the room, thus personifying the death and burial of Hiram!

After this, the candidate is made to represent Hiram, in the removal of his dead body from the place of concealment by the assassins, to the place of deposit under the Sanctum Sanctorum of the Temple. The place of its concealment is said to have been discovered by a sprig of cassia on a new-made grave, to represent which, each Mason casts a sprig of evergreen into the grave of a brother, in the ceremony of Masonic funerals. A number of Entered Apprentice Masons are commissioned to remove the dead body. They repair to the place; that is, go to the candidate wrapped in the sheet personifying the dead. One of them takes hold of his hand, pulls a little, and lets the hand slip off. Returning to the east end of the room, they report to the Master of the Lodge, that such is the putrid state of the body, the Entered Apprentice grip, (Boaz,) will not raise him. A select number of Fellow Craft Masons are next sent, and after the same unsuccessful manner, they return and report, that in consequence of the putrid state of the body, the Fellow-Craft grip, (Jachin,) will not raise him. The Master of the Lodge, representing King Solomon, then goes himself with a number of Master Masons, and by the grip of the "lion's paw," [a grasp round the wrist,] the candidate is raised upon his feet, and instructed to understand that when Hiram was raised from the grave, the first word spoken by the Master was, "There is marrow in the Bone." From this is derived the Master's Word, "MAH-HAH-BONE," as a substitute for the word which was professedly lost at the death of Hiram. This word is never to be given but on the Five Points of Masonic Fellowship: that is, foot to foot, knee to knee, breast to breast, hand to back, and mouth to ear, in which position the putrid Hiram of a candidate receives the Master's Word in a whisper from the Worshipful Master; all which ceremonies are illustrated in the following points of the Oath of the Master's Degree.

"I promise and swear that I will never give the Master Mason's Word, but on the Five Points of Fellowship, and then not above my breath."

FOOT TO FOOT.—"I swear that I will go on a Master Mason's errand the length of my cable-tow, when required, though barefoot."

KNEE TO KNEE.—"I promise and swear that I will never forget to pray for a Master Mason, when on my knees."

BREAST TO BREAST.—"I promise and swear that a Master Mason's secrets shall remain as secure in my breast as in his own."

HAND TO BACK.—"I promise and swear that I will support and promote a Master Mason's interest if in my power." And

MOUTH TO EAR.—"I swear that I will always apprise him of any danger to which I know him to be exposed."

Such are the Five Points of Masonic Fellowship, with their illustration; and whatever a Mason communicates to his brother Mason on the "FIVE POINTS," is considered a Masonic secret, the preservation of which is inviolably secured by the oath and penalty of the degree. Such Masonic tradition in relation to the death of Hiram, designed to supply the deficiency of Holy Writ, must be considered an unwarrantable assumption; a gross perversion of the Word of God; and consequently a Work of Darkness.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A Masonio Revelation.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal; or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issued by him, pnrporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationalist and Recorder, Boston.

"'Freemasonry Developed.'—The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samnel D. Greene, of Boston. The author belonged to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made snch a sensation throughout the conntry forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including tho ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is snpposed by many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book mnst be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acquainted with Mr. Greene, and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y., and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—'The Storm Gathering;" "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abdnction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What beeame of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

Publisher's Department.

Will you send in six new subscriptions?

We intended to publish the muster-roll of Mr. Hickman's regiment, also of Mr. Clark's company this week. There is plenty of room for more and we postpone publishing another week.

"Now, is the constant syllable ticking from the clock of time". Friends, are you doing all you can to extend the circulation of the Cynosure? This is a good season for such work.

The Cynosure debt was diminished during the month of December from $1,334.31 to $1,048.59. This was well done, but let us do still better during the present month.

We hope all whose subscriptions expire in January who have not already written to us will do so soon. We hope to receive renewals with new subscriptions from most of them. We have about fifteen thousand copies of the Cynosure prospectus which we wish to put in the hands of persons who will use them in obtaining new subscriptions. Will all who can distribute ten or more of them write to us? They will be promptly forwarded, post paid.

Postage on the Cynosure.

The cost of postage now depends entirely on the size and weight, and therefore some smaller papers charge but fifteen cents; and others about the size of the Cynosure charge twenty-five cents a year for postage.

THE POSTAGE ON THE CYNOSURE MUST BE PAID AT CHICAGO. It is twenty cents a year.

If the subscription price of the CYNOSURE was $2.50 or $3.00 a year, the price of many religious papers containing no more reading matter, we might afford to pay the postage ourselves, but at $2.00 year a we cannot do this.

Therefore let all send the postage, 20 cents a year, 10 cents for half a year with their renewals.

The commission on one new subscription for a year will pay the postage on your own and the new subscriber's paper. We would rather have the postage paid by commissions than in any other way.

TO THE BOYS.—"Don't be laughed out of your money or your prayers." A distinguished English admiral, who rose to the high station as the effects of his meritorious exertions, used to be fond of relating that on first leaving an humble lodging to join his ship as a midshipman, his landlady presented him with a Bible and a guinea, saying, "God bless you, and prosper you, my lad; and as long as you live never suffer yourself to be laughed out of your money or your prayers." The young sailor carefully followed this advice through life, and had reason to rejoice that he did so, while thousands have unavailingly regretted that they have persued a different course.

Topics of the Time.

A week ago King Kalakaua was in charge of our Chicago authorities who showed him through the water-works, tunnel, Stock yards and Chamber of Commerce. He saw and admired, as well as the freezing temperature would allow, the products of energy and skill; but his reception before the representatives of our commerce was simply disgusting to every respectable citizen. First, the Board of Trade, through their younger members, received their guest with yells, stamping and cat calls; then Mayor Colvin led off with a short speech in which he hardly checked an insult in an attempt to tickle the ears of men of low taste. The King had hardly left the room when two fellows attempted a personation of the reception with huge masks. This disgraceful performance was hooted down and, to the honor of the Board, the actors were suspended for a week. Such perversity of human nature can be understood with tipsy roughs, but such were not thought to be members of the Board.

The recent death of ex-Governor Bramlette at Louisville, Ky., must call attention to lottery schemes he has managed and the one he was about closing up, for the assumed benefit of the Public Library of that city. This lottery, which has been widely advertised through our leading secular papers, is thus recognized by one truth-telling Cincinnati paper: "It is one of the most impudent and gigantic frauds ever attempted. Look at the face of it. The proposition is that if the people contribute five millions of dollars to a scheme of chance—in which the name "library" is used as a bait—one-half that sum will be redistributed by lot. The gambler's frenzy has been scattered broadcast through Kentucky by this scheme. It is a passion that spreads like a conflagration, and wastes like a pestilence." At the last drawing, some years ago, a correspondent of the Courier-Journal described the idiotic frenzy of an Indiana town where part of these ill-gotten gains were distributed. "It is a striking comment on the madness folly of such wholesale swindles: "The town was on fire, the people crazy and wild with excitement. The stores and business places of the members of the lucky club were thronged with the excited populace. The holders of the ticket were hugged, kissed, and congratulated by their friends. They in turn were as much excited as the people. Several of them are described as being nearly mad with joy. One man swore that he intended to sell his farm and invest all of the proceeds in the next drawing, and he is going to do it. We venture the assertion that $10,000 worth of tickets in the next drawing can be sold in this city alone during this week."

Although the three investigating committees from Congress lately sent to Vicksburg, New Orleans and Montgomery, Alabama, will be unable to form a correct history of affairs in those disturbed sections, they are adding to our experience in the science of government. At New Orleans the venerable Bishop Joseph Wilmer of the Episcopal church said in his testimony: "With reference to the Government, I think that what we want is some means of bringing those who violate the law to punishment. Persons are sent to the penitentiary and when they return there is no stain attached to their good name. I know of no instance in which a person escaping justice has lost anything in the esteem of his friends and companions." With such a state of society it is no wonder that White Leagues may murder by wholesale in the streets of New Orleans and no hand of lawful authority be stretched out for their punishment. The weakness of Italian communities, where brigandage thrives through fear, is pardonable, and lawless savages are virtuous beside the society whose laws are reasonable, but whose citizens are conspired to break them. It is mockery to talk of the "dangerous classes" at the South, to charge the assassinations and villany of the Ku-Klux to "irresponsible boys," when public sentiment palliates and perhaps secretly applauds their crimes. And for this fearful state the whole people are responsible. At the close of the war the rebel leaders were self-convicted of the crime of treason, but were treated as if there were no such crime. The loose policy of reconstruction did not stamp out the dying embers of hatred of law and of human rights, but begot a turbulent spirit which "carpet-bag" officials have encouraged by example and precept. It is impossible to recover lost opportunities, but not the lost ground. A vigorous and wise administration may do it. But the leader of that administration may expect to lose reputation in the present generation, but a future one will crown his success with the honors of a saved and grateful people.

Gerrit Smith.

It needeth not
To tell our grief, that she would wear
The costly badge arranged with care,
Nor feign a silent, solemn air;
In palace and in cot
Alike the tender tear-drops flow;
We weep alone and sad and low,
We all as mourners seem to go.

Bring home the sage,
And lay him calmly down to rest;
No more his manly heaving breast
Shall bear the burdens of the oppressed.
The great lights of the age
Go out. The chieftains come no more;
The breakers, dashing on the shore,
Familiar voices drown amid their roar.

No pageant here;
The great need not the dull parade
Of catafalque and cavalcade:—
So soon such costly honors fade;
A flower, a prayer, a tear,
Dear words of memory spoken low,
Fond tokens, these would we bestow,
And back to love and duty go.

A clarion tone
Is hushed. The battle marchers stand
And wait around a tearful band,
Where death hath chilled a leader's hand:
The hero's work is done;
The victory this,—a nations psalm,
In every ebon hand a palm,
And Freedom's azure clear and calm.

God called him out;
He heard the voice; what if he knew
The lure of wealth, his soul was true:
And 'is from paths of ease withdrew,
And trod where fear and doubt
Dismayed the souls of weaker men;
He saw the goal with prophet's ken,
And led with fervid voice and pen.

What sacrifice
Of gold on Freedom's altar laid;
What answer when the needy prayed,
And shelter for the poor afraid:
What scorn of low device;
What lofty aim of statesmen pure,
Of trust in God the wrong to cure;
So shall his monument endure.

Yes we shall miss
The great, kind heart, the gentle tone
That friend and stranger ever won;
The work of Gerrit Smith is done.
The snows of Winter kiss
His new-made tomb. He liveth yet,
And shines in golden memories set;
Love be his lasting coronet.

Letter of Jeremiah Day, D. D.

NEW HAVEN, Conn. July 17, 1849.

Messrs.———Committee:

GENTLEMEN.—In answer to your inquiry respecting "the influence of secret societies in college," I would briefly state that although secret societies may have had, in some instances, a beneficial influence, this influence, so far as I am informed, has not been owing to their secrecy, but to other provisions of their organization. If they have done good, it has not been by means of the injunction of secrecy, but in spite of it. They might have done more good without it.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant, JEREMIAH DAY.

P. S.—What purpose can be answered by the secrecy of a literary society, but to conceal from view those defects of character and deformities of conduct which will not bear the scrutiny of the public eye?

How Shall Our Girls be Educated?

BY M. J. WHIPPLE.

Woman's rights and woman's wrongs have been written about and lectured upon both publicly and privately until people are nauseated with the wordy and useless controversy; but underneath all this smoke there is a real fire.

Any thoughtful person, who considers the ingenuity, time and money that is worse than wasted upon the absurdities of fashion, the unhappiness that mars the daily lives of many families, and the nameless miseries of multitudes who endure in silence, cannot fail to be convinced that there is something wrong in the social machine. A small class of theorists prescribe famale suffrage, the mass pass by on the other side, and take no thought whatever of the sufferings of wounded human nature.

We believe the difficulty is caused by the defective education of our girls. When the far-seeing faculties of seventy-eight of the three hundred and seventy American colleges have sufficiently penetrated the future destiny of this nation, to perceive that its only safety is in opening their doors to women, Dr. Clark comes forwarded and throws sand into the eyes of every brave girl who would dare to compete with her brother in mental culture. Instead of using his talent to heal a nation which is groaning under the extravagance of woman to-day, he condemns the only remedy which will save it from ruin. He gives many instances of girls who have been educated to death.

He speaks with great gusto of an educational martyr who "sat from 10 A. M. to 8 P. M. ceaselessly thinking and writing when she ought to have been on her bed," and not so much as asks if she walked to that examination through a drenching rain in cloth boots, with the little protection of her body so closely fitted that her breath panted for room in her lungs, or if she spent the hours of the precious night in preparing that toilet in which to contract her person.

O there are many purely gratuitous opinions in regard to the mortality of female students! Statistics show that the death rate of female students does not exceed that of male students. In nine cases out of ten, the cause of the loss of health, in those who do droop by the way, would, on proper investigation, be found far outside of the course of study pursued.

It ought to be possible to use a little common sense (or uncommon, for it is the most uncommon thing in nature) upon this subject as well as any other. Young men break down by over-study as often as young women. A young man in one of our larger colleges, who was trying to lead his class, fainted during recitation, from too close application to study. Another in the same class died of consumption before his course was completed. Why not conclude from those facts that the "peculiar organization" of man will not permit him to pursue a college course of study? Make him believe it if you can, and you have not done the country the injury you do in intimidating the young women from entering college.

A male student frightened out of college by his "peculiar organization" enters upon some business enterprise and becomes a producer. A female student thus terrified enters a gay round of frivolous existence, and becomes a consumer of the living and lives of those who must support her.

The strain ot dress and dressing, the late hours and exciting scenes through which she passes in fashionable society do not break down her health, but the "mental strain upon her system at all times as required by taking a classical course of study!" How many of our fashionable young ladies regard their "peculiar organization" during a winter at Washington or any of our large cities?

It is hard enough already to convince women she is not a doll, and mankind in general are slow enough to see that her culture is of importance to their own well being mentally, morally, spiritually and financially, without putting such a damper upon one of the grandest movements in human history.

Do we never see a "transparent pallor" steal over the features of one of the followers of Dr. Clark's theory? Educate her in the seminary with only her own sex, and the "transparent pallor" is almost sure to overtake her sometime in life. If her health is not broken down, (and it is quite as likely to be), in that unnatural place, she comes out of it a child in knowledge of human nature. Where is the graduate of a female seminary to see the human side of human nature? in society? By no means. Fair faces and flattering speeches hide foul hearts and fiery tempers, and is it for the health of women and humanity that she unite her destiny with man, of whose character she has no possible means of judging?

Let Dr. Clark and the editor of the Popular Science Monthly educate their daughters in their seminaries, and let those who believe in co-education as the only true system of education, educate theirs in the colleges to which they are granted admission, and, at the age of forty, let us see over whose features the "transparent pallor" has stolen. Let us see whose lines have fallen to them in pleasant places.

Possibly there are two sides to this question, it may be well for their sons to know a little more of the merits and de-merits of women than they are likely to find out in society. Some send their daughters to female seminaries to prevent their forming acquaintances to whom they object. There are many unhappy living witnesses of the fut lity of this plan.

In the good time coming, when the grand truth shall be ful'y recognized that woman's work is equal in importance to man's, when she shall be equally fitted for that work with him, and when by co-education she shall intelligently accept her mate, how will the amount of true happiness be increased, and the number of household skeletons be diminished! Such minds will not dwindle to dolls and fashion-plates, but become man's fit complement and companion, the suitable moulders of the character of the nation.

The Last Circular from Gerrit Smith.

[During the last month of his life Mr. Smith published the following appeal to the American people on the continued oppression of the negro as illustrated by the school authorities of Indiana in ejecting colored children from the public schools by law.]

INDIANAPOLIS, Dec. 3.

Brazil, Clay county, about fifty miles west of here, is in a fever of excitment over the practical application of the recent decision of the Supreme Court regarding colored children in the schools. Thirty-five colored children have been ejected from the public schools there by order of the local trustees, and against the earnest protestations of the School Superintendent. Many of the children cried bitterly when informed that they must leave, and begged to be allowed to remain, but the trustees insisted that they must leave, and they were so informed by their teachers. The Board of Trustees consists of three members, one of whom is a Democrat and two are Republicans.—N. Y. Tribune.

I envy not the man who can read this extract with dry eyes and an unmoved heart. I envy not the man who cares not for the grief which wrung the little breasts of these dear children, as they were driven from the school rooms they loved, and from the white children they loved and by whom they were loved.

Where rests the responsibility for this outrage? Chiefly on the hesitancy of the Republican party to pass the pending Civil Rights Bill—chiefly on the perfidity of this party, which said in its platform of 1872:

"Complete liberty and exact equality in the enjoyment of all civil, political and public rights should be established and maintained throughout the Union by efficient and appropriate State and Federal legislation. Neither the law nor its administration should admit any discrimination in respect of citizens by reason of race, creed, color or previous condition of servitude."

If the Republican party had had the bravery and justice to pass the bill, such cowards and scoundrels as those in Indiana would have been cowed in the presence of these high qualities, and would not have dared to do this deviltry. But the shrinking of the party from passing the bill gave these cowards and scoundrels ample occasion to despise both the bill and the party.

May the God of justice and mercy prompt this party to rise to its feet by passing, very speedily, this bill or one essentially like it! If the passage of it be delayed, hell will break loose again all over the land, as it did in the days of the "Fugitive Slave Act," when, even in the remotest North, slave hounds were, everywhere, upon the track of poor men, women and children.

But why do I blame the Republican party only—and, this too, notwithstanding it gave nearly its entire Congressional vote for this Civil Rights Bill? Why do I not blame the Democratic party also—the party which gave not one vote for it, and which was the great upholder of slavery and the ally of our enemy in the Civil War? My answer is—because nothing better was to be expected from such a party. In the light of its ever disdainful and cruel treatment of the negro, all the world knew that the strong words for him in its platform of 1872 were only hypocrisy. But the different character of the Republican party made it entirely reasonable to regard the like strong words in its platform as spoken in sincerity.

I proceed to ask, what is the excuse of this crushing of hearts and blasting of hopes—the hearts and hopes of even innocent and hopeless little children? It is that the laws require it. Whose laws? Not His surely, who is "no respecter of persons" and "hath made of one blood all nations?" His laws forbid all crimes against our common humanity—all abuse and contempt of any portion of it.

It is claimed that the Federal Constitution, if not indeed affording a warrant for striking at the very manhood of our colored brother in the atrocious and murderous wrongs inflicted upon him, does nevertheless forbid the crime. In its obligation to protect the rights of citizenship is included its obligation to protect all the rights of manhood. I might admit that ingenuity can dig down into this instrument and bring up what, with the help of the pro slavery training of the country, shall look a little like an apology for oppression and injustice. But the day for interpreting the Constitution in behalf of oppression and injustice has passed away. We now read it in the light of that liberty and justice, which, as they shine all over its surface, determine its legal character, whatever in its depths may be tortured against that character.

Reluctant as I am to "speak evil of dignities," I must nevertheless be frank enough to say, that this distinction, which is drawn between national citizenship and state citizenship is an absurdity. I need not add another to my arguments on former occasions, that national citizenship cannot be enjoyed without concurrent state citizenship, or rather without the oneness of the latter with the former. I add that this national citizenship, which can be baffled and brought to nought by state citizenship, is a discovery which reflects but little honor upon its eminent judicial discoverers. To be a citizen of the nation is to be a citizen of every State in the nation.

But candor requires me to go farther, and to confess that I would have no account whatever made of laws which are repugnant to the divine laws. The conclusion that such laws are no laws needs above all things to be accepted. If widely accepted now, it would work such a blessed revolution in the minds of men, as would make the nineteenth century the glory of all the centuries. It would do more than all the pulpits and presses towards lifting up mankind out of practical and blasphemous atheism into the sweetly transfiguring recognition of the paramount claims of heaven. . . . .

Alas, the South! Did the law of slavery bring her peace? Far from it! But the tears and bloodshed, poverty and desolation to which it brought her, it abundantly convinced her that "there is no peace to the wicked." And, now again, she cries out for peace—and, now again, her sins will not let her have it. Peace will be hers when she shall consent to "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly with God," and not till then. It is for her to elect whether she will have it now, or whether she will, for twenty or thirty years longer, be the prey of a troubled conscience and appalling fears. It will not, however, be ten years, ere she will see and lament with tears of anguish, the great and guilty mistake of her present attitude. With the help of the many truly Christian white men and women there are in the South, and with the help of that philanthrophy of the North, which already pours out upon this subject scores of thousands of dollars yearly, the colored masses be rapidly educated; and let me here add that just so rapidly will they assert their manhood before the terror-stricken faces around them, provided the policy of making enemies of these classes shall be persisted in.

I close with beseeching the South to except the wise advice which President Grant offers her in his recent Message. He is her friend, and he says to her: "Treat the negro as a citizen and voter, as he is and must remain." Let her bear in mind, too, that the President has no pride of learning, and does not give to the word "citizen" the narrow definition which the ingenuity of judicial learning gives to it. He is, very eminently, a man of common sense, and therefore does he give to the word a common sense and comprehensive meaning.

Peterboro, Dec. 12th, 1874.

Ten Thousand Men Wanted!

Before the conclusion of this century we shall need ten thousand men, or perhaps five times that number, to set apart to a certain business, not hard to pursue, and for which legions are well qualified who are scarcely fit for anything beside.

It is not to make sacrifices of money and labor, nor of their honor and good name among men; not to endanger life or limb in any wise; no, nor even to do anything that a small boy cannot do. True, some sacrifices must be made and much hard word done, as well much money expended, but we have three hundred Gideonites to do the fighting and all the hard and dangerous work. These men are constituted with each a backbone which reaches all the way from the boots to the bump of firmness on the summit of the head, so that when they go to the water they "lap with their tongue bringing the hand to the mouth."

These Gideonites will get the victory, but when it comes, as it surely will, we shall need an army of men, who could do nothing but put on the break and tremble in the heat of conflict, to SHOUT VICTORY, when the danger is over, and to add, "Did we not conquer the beast?" Now as a reward to the thousands who do the shouting, a pension will be given with many tokens of appreciation of service done in this conflict with the minions of the "mystery of iniquity" and secretism. All back pay will also be secured to this rear army, for service rendered while the battle was raging—such as croaking, helping to check our forces, cheering the enemy, etc., all which will be greatfully remembered and promptly paid at the end of the conflict. Be silent, gentlemen, only as you croak, to keep your vocals in time till the victory is gained and danger past, then shout "We licked the rebels!" See that? POTOMAC.

The Latest Expostions.

MR. EDITOR:—The recent and present difficulties in Vicksburg and New Orleans reminds one that it was only a few week ago since a large delegation of so called Knight Templars visited the latter city and were feted and fed by the excitable inhabitants; and when the people turned out en masse to laugh at and gaze upon the numerous high-cock-alorums who strutted about in gaudy and fantastic regalia while their lesser favored brethren trudged along behind as so many "lesser lights," but all presenting an appearance absurd, grotesque and ridiculous, and only fit to be laughed at by little boys, or what would be far better, hooted and scoffed at by all thinking men and respectable citizens.

But the thought forces itself almost irresistably upon me, why could not this so-called benevolent and charitable Masonic institution do something to reconcile the turbulent spirits that are causing the present agitation in the South, and thus show in a practical manner what it has been so long vainly preaching in lodge rooms: "Behold how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity." But some one will say, "Oh! but you know Masons as such don't interfere in politics." Then pray tell me in what good thing do they interfere? Have they any asylums for the sick, the aged, the poor, either in this or any civilized country on the face of the globe? How many charities, public or private, have the forty-three Grand Lodges of Masons in America supported since the first lodge was formed in New England about seventy years ago? Not one exclusively Masonic. And still Masonry sets itself up to be a benevolent and charitable institution par excellence. The Grand Lodge of Illinois has been in existence for over thirty years; it has collected and squandered millions of dollars in all that time and yet with all its so-called benevolence and all its so-called charity, I defy any member of the nefarious ring running this gigantic grand fraud to point me out a single orphan that the Grand Lodge has educated and apprenticed in all these long thirty years.

I have been a Mason almost since I became a man. Masonry has heaped upon me every honor which it could confer except making me Grand Master. I claim to know Masonry as well as any living man, and yet looking at it in the most favorable light, I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that it is without doubt the most absurd folly, if not the most pernicious and devilish society on the face of the globe. The first lesson I was taught in the practical working of Freemasonry was downright, deliberate fraud. That has been my experience for over a period of eighteen years, and the last, or all but the last which I learned in the accursed Masonic lodge was that the second highest officer in the concern to which I belonged was declared to be a fraud, a cheat and a liar, and was proved to be so by a vote of twenty-nine to nine on the fourth day of November, 1874. And notwithstanding all that Freemasonry is, and all that old men and Masons know it to be, yet some of our so-called Christian ministers join the accursed institution; and not only so, but after knowing what it is they maintain a sort of a beggarly connection with it. And I here assert and in doing so I defy honest contradiction, that every Christian man, and more especially every Christian clergyman, who becomes a Freemason and subscribes money to support a Masonic lodge, commits a crime against God worse, far worse, than did Achan. For he robs the Almighty of his glory. He robs the Saviour of his office as Mediator. He denies the Lord who bought him. And the inevitable fiat has gone forth, "He that denyeth me before men him shall I deny before the angels of God."

But, my dear clerical brother, let us more closely examine this subject and see just how far you have transgressed and what are your chances of being a blessing, either to yourself or to the congregation over which you by accident and the potent power of greenbacks are called to preside. On the night you were made a Freemason, you left the bosom of your family—your mother, perhaps—your wife and children—and you wended your way through the murky streets to an upper room where the Masonic lodge was held. Here you were ushered into a room called the "preparation room" and here after a few minutes you were received by the secretary of the lodge accompanied by the "Junior Deacon" and two other brethren. The following questions were solemnly proposed to you and were by you as solemnly answered:

"Do you seriously declare upon your honor before these gentlemen, that unbiased by friends and uninfluenced by mercenary motives, you freely and voluntarily offer yourself a candidate for the mysteries of Masonry?" Ans. "I do."

"Do you seriously declare upon your honor before these gentlemen that you are prompted to solicit the privileges of Masonry by a favorable opinion conceived of the institution, a desire of knowledge and a sincere wish of being servicable to your fellow creatures?" Ans. "I do."

"Do you seriously declare upon your honor before these gentlemen that you will cheerfully conform to all the ancient established usages and customs of the fraternity?" Ans. "I do."

And so you swear upon your sacred honor that you freely and voluntarily offered yourself a candidate for the mysteries of Freemasonay. And you even did this without being unbiased by friends or influenced by mercenary motives. But, my dear Christian brother, what are those great and grave mysteries you met with in Freemasonry? Did you discover any mystery there equal to the conception, the incarnation, or the resurrection and assension of our divine Redeemer? Did you discover any mystery whatever in Freemasonry? If you did and that the said mystery or mysteries be of any use to mankind in general you must indeed be a very poor pastor, a very poor shepherd, if you did not at once impart and unfold them to your flock. I am at least as old a Mason as you are and perhaps older; at any rate I was made a Mason very near twenty years ago, and the only mystery I ever discovered in the concern is that men, and sensible business men at that, are found follish enough to join it. Masonry is without doubt one of the most gigantic frauds—one of the grandest humbugs on the face of the globe; and men coming to know this, as they invaribly do, and yet maintaining a steady connection with such knavery and such a pack of knaves is to me a greater mystery still. If these are the only mysteries you so "freely and voluntarily offered" yourself a candidate for, why there are thousands of Masons in the State of Illinois alone who could have thoroughly posted you in the matter without charging you a penny; whereas you have at least been fleeced out of fifty dollars for just the very same information in a Masonic lodge.

But you have gone further—you have declared upon your sacred honor and in presence of witnesses that "you were prompted to solicit the privileges of Freemasonry from a favorable opinion conceived of the institution. Pray, how could you preconceive a favorable opinion of what you knew nothing about? Is not this at least prevarication on your part, if not downright, deliberate lying? And bear in mind you are but yet barely on the threshold of Freemasonry, and if the very beginning of this system be falsehood, what must the middle be? what must the Master's degree and the Royal Arch be? But again. You knew the mysteries of Masonry before you joined it or you did not. If you knew all about them then you must be a fool to pay your money for that which you had; and if you did not know them, how dared you swear upon your honor that you formed a preconceived favorable opinion of them.

Masonic swearing is to come yet. In the third declaration above mentioned, you seriously and solemnly swear by your sacred honor that you will "conform to all the ancient established usages and customs of the fraternity." Now how in the name of common sense could you "seriously" swear to "conform" to "usages" and "customs" of which you were then in the grossest ignorance? How did you then know but that one of the "ancent usages" and "established customs" of the fraternity was to cut somebody's throat from ear to ear; to tear his left breast open and to sever his body in twain; take his bowls from thence and burn them to ashes and scatter the ashes to the four winds of heaven? And yet you solemnly swore beforehand to "conform to all the ancient established usages and customs of the fraternity."

It was dishonorable in Freemasonry to compel you to take such an oath, but it was still more dishonorable in you to take it, and I will only add that if you had acted at any of your church meetings (if such a thing could be possible) as you acted in that Masonic ante-room on that memorable night of your initiation your deacons or other church officers would immediately prefer charges against you and ignominiously expel you from the ministry.

But let us proceed. The secretary, having pocketed the little initiation fee of $15 or $20, returned into the lodge room and you were then left "in the hands of your friends." You were ordered to strip off your clothes, which you did,—boots, stockings and all, even your clerical collar and cravat must disappear—and you finally stood in that outer room a pitiable shivering object, perhaps the laughing stock of three or four hod-carriers, or worse still, three or four unbelieving Jews, who were mentally wishing that your wife or mother, or perhaps your whole congregation could see what a very sorry figure their beloved pastor then cut. They threw you an old and dirty pair of drawers to put on, and tied them around your body with a dirtier string. Your right foot was thrust into an old slipper; the left leg of the old drawers was tucked up above the knee so as to make the knee bare; all your rings, studs and sleeve-buttons were taken off; the left bosom of your shirt (the only article you were permitted to keep on) was turned back so as to make your left breast bare; an old hoodwink was placed over your eyes, and a dirty old blue rope was tied once around your clerical neck; and in that pitiable, miserable, shameful condition you were prepared to be initiated into those wonderful mysteries which Masonry claims to posses and of which you ware so eagerly in search. What a degrading condition for a man to suffer himself to be placed in, and especially one who is commissioned to carry the glad tidings of salvation to the ends of the earth!

But, my dear Christian friend, you are not through yet. And so you are led gropingly forward to a door and your new found friend, the Junior Deacon, (saloon-keeper, pimp, scalawag, rascal, or whatever else he may be) takes you by the right hand, and with your ordained, clerical knuckles he gives "three loud and distinct knocks."

These are answered by a like number from within. The door is thrown open and a bogus dialogue takes place in which you are represented as the Rev. Septimus Jones, D. D., "who has long been in darkness and now seeks to be brought to light." What! you, a Doctor of Divinity, the ambassador of Christ, a graduate of a celebrated university, the minister of a wealthy and aristocratic congregation! You! groping in darkness and ignorance with an old hoodwink over your eyes and humbly presenting yourself at the door of a Masonic lodge to receive knowledge—to be led from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God!"

There you stood in that open doorway, gazed upon and laughed at by the gaping crowd inside, a fit object of pity and derision. After a short time you were admitted, the door was closed behind you and now you were indeed fairly within the unholy portals of Freemasonry. There you stood a fresh victim to be offered to the Moloch of the Masonic lodge, having left all you possessed outside—your Christianity, your high and holy calling—all you were and all you hoped to be—and now you are about to take another "advanced step" and plunge yourself deeper and deeper in the slough of iniquity by denying the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ even before men. You were received upon the point of a sharp instrument pressing your naked left breast when you entered the lodge, and now you are conducted towards the center of the room where "you are caused to kneel for the benefit of prayer. A saloon-keeper, a gambler, a Jew, or whoever else may be master of the lodge, arose in his place and repeated the following, which Masons call a prayer, and all for your especial benefit that you may become a good man and a good Mason. Here is your prayer:"

"Vouchsafe thine aid Almighty Father of the universe to this our present convention, and grant that this candidate for Masonry may so dedicate and devote his life to thy service, that he may become a true and faithful brother among us. Endue him with a competency of thy divine wisdom, that by the aid of the sure principles of our order he may be better able to display the beauties of holiness to the honor and glory of thy holy name. Amen. So mote it be.

And now in contradistinction to this so-called prayer of the Masonic lodge, allow me to quote from memory a few passages only from the holy Bible, which Masons blasphemously claim as one of the "three great lights." "No man cometh unto the Father but by me." "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name that will I do that the Father may be glorified in the Son." "I am the door of the sheep." "He that entereth not in by the door into the sheep-fold but climbeth up some other way the same is a thief and a robber." "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid which is Jesus Christ."

And now I put it to you squarely and honestly, do you believe the New Testament and the Protestant evangelical doctrines therein taught? If you do, how can you reconcile your Masonic with your Christian profession? You know you cannot serve God and mammon. You know that Masonry emphatically forbids even a bare allusion to Jesus Christ in any part of its abomniable ritual, and hence as a Mason, you are called upon to deny, and do deny the Lord Jesus Christ by affiliating with and supporting the pernicious, infidel (nay, worse than infidel) system of Freemasonry.

I beseach you then as a Mason—nay, I implore of you in the name of Him whose minister you pretend to be, to renounce all connection with Freemasonry and to do all in your power to dissuade the young men in your congregation from being swindled by such a notorious confidence game.

Mr. Editor, having already trespassed on your valuable space, more, far more than I at first intended, I will now conclude by promising to give your readers at the earliest possible opportunity, a full exposition of the correct work of Ancient Freemasonry as contained in the three degrees of Entered Apprentice, Fellow-craft and Master Mason, and unless I change my mind, I shall go as far as the Reform News.

From the General Agent.

Bro. Stoddard sends the following brief note of his work in Logan county, Ohio:

Whereas, Every citizen of our country has a vital interest in examining and knowing all that affects the welfare of society, whether in the family, the church, or the state; and

Whereas, All organizations founded on the principle of secrecy, and keeping their proceedings concealed from the public may be fraught from the danger to the church and the state; and

Whereas, Freemasonry is such an organization; therefore,

Resolved, That we as citizens have a right to know the proceedings of this fraternity, and so long as this knowledge is withheld from us we cannot but look upon it as imminently dangerous to our Republic.

The above was passed at Huntsville, O., with a single dissenting vote, at the close of a series of three lectures in the U. P. church, Jan. 11 and 12, 1875. I have preached twice and delivered five lectures in Logan Co., in the last five days, and although the weather has been intensely cold the attendance has been good and the interest is on the increase.

Brethren in Ohio, be not discouraged, but put on the armor and rally at Mansfield, Febuary 17th, for a grand triumph. J. P. STODDARD.

A Flying Trip to Michigan.

ON BOARD THE TRAIN }
AT WATERLOO, Ind. }
Jan. 14th, 1875.

The calls of business are sometimes imperious. In answer to one of these, I find myself comfortably seated in a coach on the Ft. Wayne and Jackson road, with a ticket for Saginaw, Michigan, in my pocket. I left Defiance, Ohio, yesterday, in company with my wife who stops in this vicinity with some friends until my return.

. . . After breakfast this morning I went over to Bro. Jeffords, where I found himself and wife in good health; and Bro. Jacob Wolford and family are living with them. Bro. W. is the Wesleyan Methodist pastor here, and I regret to say is in very poor health. He is an earnest, faithful worker in the anti-secrecy reform, and has done much efficient service, mostly in Jay county. I took an early dinner with them and then "took the train." Just now Bro. Bassett, another W. M. preacher, tried and true, having heard I was on the train, comes in, his face all aglow with genial good nature, and (as the train starts) with a hearty shake of the hand and saying "how do ye do?" and "good bye," almost in the same breath, goes out and we move on. There comes the conductor, a fine, intelligent looking man, and dangling on his watch guard hangs a pretty gold seal shaped like a keystone, observing which I say to a fellow passenger, "Our conductor is a Royal Arch Mason. "How do you know?" is his response. "Do you not see the peculiar shape of his watch seal?" "Yes; what of it?" Wait till he comes nearer and I will read you what is inscribed on it. Notice the letters." Now he draws near and stands waiting for our tickets. As I hand him mine, eyeing his badge, I read aloud: "Hiram Tyrian Widow's Son sent to King Solomon." The conductor stops short, eyes me a moment, and then, with his "jewel" safe, (almost) passes. I find my comrade to be one Mr. Kline, of Angola, a member of the Disciple church, a warm friend of Rev. R. Faurot, and an Anti-mason. By the way, I find a great many of our Disciple brethren in different parts of the country opposed to secretism. Entertaining the views they do on church government, I do not understand how any of them can consistently be otherwise. I frequently tell them that "So far as Masonry is concerned I am a Campbellite." Whirling along over the frosty iron, with the thermometer at eight below zero, is unpleasantly suggestive of "smash-ups," broken bones, and other terrible things which so frequently happen on railways. Only yesterday, the main coach of this very train was thrown from the track, while crossing a "trestle," killing two passengers outright and injuring many more.

But here we are at ANGOLA.

Mrs. K. gets off and we wait the "twenty minutes for dinner," so popular with hungry travelers. Again we are moving rapidly forward, and often wondering what per cent of the traveling public are "Speculative Masons." I "count noses," and find that of the twenty-five persons in this coach only three have on their persons "the mark of the beast." All three are Knights Templar. The conductor also wears a pin emblematical of the K. T. degree.

So I learn that he has not only walked and crawled over the "Rollers" and under the Living Arch, but has drank wine from a human skull, and invoked a two-fold damnation on his soul. What a pity! Nay, what an outrage that an institution thus degrading to all that is noble in manhood, finds patrons among intelligent men! Now as we stop, rather a verdant specimen of nature enters the coach, puffing away a a cigar as largely as General Grant himself. But all his pleasure is suddenly arrested by the conductor who informs him in a tone at once polite and firm, that "there is a smoking car ahead." For once "a word to the" unwise "is sufficient," and he vanishes toward the "smoking car." This reminds me of Mrs. Wallace's tract on Masonic chasity. (Which I advise every Cynosure reader to get, read and distribute.) Well, to all lovers of "pure air" it is a matter of congratulation that if men will "be filthy still," in the use of the noxious weed, they are not allowed to poison the atmosphere which decent people breathe on board a train. We are within ten miles of Jackson, and there is a decided improvement in the appearance of the country. Large farms, good buildings, and fine orchards abound on all sides. Riding on a railway presents a far better opportunity for studying human nature than it does for painting landscapes. Here in this one small room are the representatives of all parts of the compass, of many of the avocations, and the walks of life. The sedateness and calmness of experience and of age; the vigor of manhood and womanhood; the gaiety and beauty of youth, and the innocence of prattling childhood are all mingled here in striking contrast. But we are all now at

JACKSON, MICHIGAN.

These Michigan people are a clever and intelligent folk. Then they are tasty too. The most superbly elegant in its finish and furnishing of any passenger depot I have ever seen, is this one at Jackson. None of the larger Western cities have any depot to compare with this. What in many places would be tedious and irksome—waiting for a train—is actually interesting here, and one almost regrets that he is not obliged to stay longer. But, equal to their good taste, is the connection of trains, and we only have twenty minutes to wait. And now we are steaming away for Lansing. It is getting too dark to write, so I shall bid you good night.

Sincerely yours,
J. T. KIGGINS.

Odd-fellowship in Iowa.

ALBION, Iowa, Jan. 9, 1874.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I presume you have seen the account of the great demonstration of Odd-fellows last Tuesday evening at Marshall, Iowa.

It was noticed two or three weeks ago that Mr. Colfax would speak at the above named place on the 5th inst. The subject was not stated. But, when time came and the Odd-fellows began to come in from all directions, it was strongly surmised what the subject would be.

The great Apostle of Odd-fellowship delivered a eulogy on his favorite institution, that kind, charitable and humane institution, that is so good its ceremonies must be practiced in secret in the night; daylight is not allowed to shine upon them. It was called an able address. But I cannot understand how an able address can be made on so weak a subject. When we see such demonstrations, we can imagine where the greatness originates. If a man can give the sign and grip, i. e., if he can pinch the right knuckle, or run his fore-finger up the side of his nose, he is then qualified for office; merit has very little to do with it. The "Daughters of Rebekah" came in to see their father for the first time.

I will state one instance of the fidelity of Odd-fellowship out of several that came within my knowledge. A man in our town, named Andrew Bailey, joined the Odd-fellows. After two or three years, he with his wife moved West. The lodge gave him a certificate of good standing. He joined a lodge west, and was a leading member, and held an office in it. After about three years he died. The lodge gave his wife a certificate of her husband's membership in good standing. She came back with one small child and presented the certificate to a member of the lodge. He asked to retain it till he could present it to the lodge for action. She allowed him to take it, and they refused it to her, and never gave her assistance. The act was published, but they said they were waiting for orders from the Grand Lodge, which never came. I knew several other instances of like charity, but let this suffice. Mr. Bailey was a young man of first standing in society.

A. C. MOFFATT.

From Bro. Freeman.

May I be permitted to say to your readers that I praise and thank my God with all my heart that I have never, though solicited to do so, put myself in a position before any oath-bound organization where I could be "black-balled." No, thank God! I have never been left to go down, down so low! I might but for Divine grace; and my soul exults in the grace that has saved me. Praise the Lord. And may I further be allowed to express my deep and heartfelt sorrow, and also ask my brethren to join in prayer for the person who for some reason foreign to Christianity, is willing to asperse the reputation of any one for the expression of his honest convictions of the right. The Lord pity and have mercy on him! Does any one inquire the motive for such scandal? I answer, I can conceive no other than to cover deeper from detection the wickedness that is an essential element in those orders. Men who lend themselves to such work seem willing to blot the good name of a servant of God, to the destruction of his influence, and so rob the world of his usefulness for life, to shield their order, which merits and can receive from God only reprehension. Does this not savor of the spirit that clamored for the crucifixion of the Lord of life and glory, and that a murderer might be delivered from deserved punishment? and which said at the same time "Let this man's blood be upon us and on our children;" and not long after said, "ye intend to bring this man's blood upon us?"

O when I see the perversity of poor fallen human nature thus illustrated, my soul weeps, and I begin anew to ask where is deliverance to be found? And what of the end? My soul is exceedingly sorrowful; and I cry unto God for help.

I pity the man whose perversenes could lead him to make that unmanly and unchristian attack upon me in the Standard, which appeared a while since, in which he calls the institution of Masonry "time-honored." Is it? So is sin. So is the Prince of the power of the air, 'the spirit that now worketh in the children of disobedience;" and so is human depravity.

O Lord save men from such self-deception. Help, Lord, for vain is the help of man! A. D. FREEMAN.

A Conscience-smitten Mason.

A correspondent in Ashtabula county, Ohio, sends an interesting letter, which he says is not for publication but to suggest further inquiries. The following is selected for the purpose. Old citizens of Lucas county may be furnish further information:

I have just been reading Valance, which reminded me of an interview I had with a physician who had been a resident of Maumee City. I think the interview was in July, 1848, and was substantially this, according to my best recollection. A citizen of that place, a tavern-keeper, I think his name was Tyler, was suspected by some of having been an accomplice in the murder of Morgan. When walking in the street he would stop very suddenly and look back, first over one shoulder and then over the other as if expecting to see something very horrible, and then quickly pass on a short distance, and then go through the same operation again. When in his house, perhaps looking in a book, he would start suddenly and look out at a window on one side of the house and then walk quickly across the floor to another window and look out of that in the same manner. And so he lived, all the time running down until he became so reduced that he was not expected to live more than a day or two, when he declared that he could not die until he had made a confession. A Mason present told him that if his confession was anything that would disgrace either himself or his family that he had better keep that confession to himself. Two Masons then shut themselves in a room with the dying man and remained with him until he died; no others were permitted to enter.

Rev. Lucien Farnham.

NEWARK, Ill., Jan. 11, 1875.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—My dear husband, Rev. Lucien Farnham, died the 8th of last July, and was buried at Princeton on the 10th. President Blanchard was there and made an addres at the funeral. I afterwards read the Cynosure through and through, thinking to find some notice of my husband's death from President Blanchard. I read his letters from Bureau Co. to the Cynosure, thinking he would certainly notice it somewhere. But no notice was taken of it. I wish there had been, as many will not hear of it only through the Cynosure. [Editorial notice will be found in the Cynosure of July 23d, 1874.—ED]

He was a warm friend of the Cynosure, and opposed to all secret societies. One of his last acts was to run all round town and solicit names to send to the convention at Syracuse. He was the warm friend of every Christian and philanthropic enterprise. He passed to the bright world of spirits on his 75th birthday, in the fullness of the blessings of the Christian religion, after an illness of less than one week. As his life had been radiant with good, so his last end was crowned with the peace of a soul stayed in God, and his exit from earth was triumphant.

Forty-four years of his life were passed in this State, and in the work of the Gospel ministry. Commencing at Jacksoville in 1830; then at Princeton in the autumn of 1833; commenced preaching there to the first Congregational church organized in the State, for six years, and lived to see that denomination multiply its churches in the State to the number of 240. Prior to 1850, he was pastor of the Congregational church at Batavia for nine years, and the last twenty-three years of his life were passed in Newark where he died..

He stood manfully at his post and fought for the enslaved and lowly, when the price of such daring was the reproach and the contumely of the titled and the honored among men. He was one of the earliest to espouse the anti-slavery and temperance causes, and he gave to these enterprises his warmest sympathies, his best intellectual efforts, and his untiring strength. He was wise in council and efficient in action. He loved his chosen work, and was never happier than in the arduous labors of the Gospel. Revivals in religion found a warm place in his heart, and many will be the stars in the crown of his rejoicing forever. Of him it might be truly said, "He walked with God." After a life of full fruition, he has crossed over to the other shore, and is now singing a new song, the song of Moses and the Lamb. "Our beloved pastor has entered into rest." That was the motto over the pulpit at the service at the church at Newark. He was beloved by all his friends and neighbors.

Yours, most respectfully,
MRS L. FARNHAM.

Good Advice from a Father in Israel.

BOLIVAR, O.

I wish to keep square with the Cynosure, and a little ahead if possible. Those three months presents, that I made some time since to certain friends, of the Cynosure and Free Methodist, were all thankfully received and highly esteemed. I shall still keep doing my best to circulate the Cynosure. I love it dearly; I am so glad to see that her stakes are being strengthened and her borders widening. This is as it should be, and will be, and it will be to a far greater extent, for I have no hesitancy in saying that I believe the Cynosure to be the strongest exponent of corruption and most unselfish advocate of true light, liberty, virtue, morality, temperance and religion now extant, and also that heaven itself is in full sympathy with it. Then take courage, my brethren, in this mighty reform. If God be for us, who can be against us. All that is wanting to double, yea, triple our present subscription, is for each subscriber, or lover of truth, to harness up, put on the whole armor and move forward upon the enemy's ranks, and just hand over each one or two new subscribers, that is all; and we most certainly can do so much.

I wish to say a word in regard to those petitions. I have been working and have some hundred names on the legal voter's petition, and not a few on the other. I expect to have a pretty long roll to send you by the first of February. But my mind has been somewhat perplexed at the amount of indifference and ignorance manifested by many while getting their signatures. I believe, my brethren, that we who are fighting this monster evil are somewhat to blame. Wherein? you ask. Why we have been winking too much at the accursed thing. We have been simply treating it as a moral question, which has been settled years ago with the people and Masonry is still the same. The fact is we have been feeding and pampering the monstrous beast until he has grown fat on our hands in many places. You may ask, my readers, wherein have we done this wicked thing? Why in the first place, have we not, all of us professors, with very few exceptions, been supporting this wicked institution, by receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper at the hands of these lodge-men? Has not our money gone to support them and their lodges? Worse still, have we not gone to the polls and cast our votes in favor of more than two-thirds of these lodgemen who now govern both church and state, make our laws, and we have to submit, be they good or bad? O, my dear friends, think of this! Look at this piece of inconsistency, and let us do so no more. If it is true that secret societies swindle men out of their money, their freedom and their religion, and that their rule is now felt in all our cities, towns and villages, is it not high time that we quit this child's play with them, and be and act more consistently than we have been? Strike at once at the root of the evil, as we were compelled to do in our late slave-holder's rebellion. Then victory will perch upon our banners as it did then. God has declared that he cannot make the least allowance for sin, and that he is angry with the wicked every day; and I believe he has as much of a hand in this reform as in the other. Now, in the first place, let us level our guns at those adherent secret oath-bound ministers, no matter who they are; and say to them, Sirs, we cannot conscientiously receive the sacrament of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ at your hands, whose blessed name you discard in your lodge devotion. Neither can we support you and your lodge with our money, until you make a public surrender of the same. This is rather a bitter pill, my brethren, on both sides, and will be hard to take, but we must down with it, that a thorough purging may take place and a perfect cure be affected. We must be honest with our patients, for surely God will hold us accountable for the manner of our treatment. In the next place we must at once resort to the elective franchise; select our truest, strongest, and best qualified anti-secret men to fill all our offices, and then all vote for them; and it will not be long till we elect them too. This will be the grandest work that has been done yet for the overthrow of these secret oath-bound institutions. They will all begin to tremble mightily, when once this is made the issue, and the issue it will be, and then we shall have no trouble to get the people to read and have their minds enlightened upon this important subject. Every one will want to get hold of the Cynosure to see and hear what it is talking about.

I was much gratified by seeing the resolutions adopted by the Indiana State Association. That looks something like business. God bless that committee, all of them, and help us all to practice what we teach. Now, friends of the Cynosure, I wish to say in conclusion, with the Anti-Masonic Review, 1831, "As nothing can be riper, so nothing can be fitter for destruction by the power of the ballot-box than Freemasonry and other similar institutions. Sober men may rejoice that they have a way at the polls to enforce their abhorrence of the impious system without disturbing the peace of the church, and all the haters of the vain-glorious and deceitful institutions may give their vote without contention or reproach to put Freemasonry and all other oath-bound institutions where they will stay put under under the ban of public opinion, among the past misfortunes of our blessed country." JOSEPH KEEL, SR.

Thoroughly Converted.

Editor Cynosure:—Your very excellent paper receives a hearty welcome at "Uncle Billy's" house. It is wel read and re-read by many of the inhabitants of Franklin, in DeKalb Co. Through the instruction on Masonry given in your paper and the exposure of the same, many are having their eyes opened upon the accursed thing, and are thereby becoming strong Anti-masons. We believe with you, that Masonry will do more towards making any honest man a perjurer, a rogue and a dishonest man in the full sense of the word than any other abomination in existence. Yea, verily, we believe that it is almost impossible for a man to be upright and honest towards his fellow-man and his God, and be a Mason. It is only of late that we have had our eyes opened on the subject. We were always in favor of Masonry, as we had always mingled with them, read their works, and thereby been deceived and blindfolded by that damning artifice of those who were duped into that association of pollution, sin and wickedness. We may earnestly thank God for your paper and for "Uncle Billy," a man of sterling worth as an Anti-mason. May God give you such continued success in your glorious cause, so that every minister who calls himself a minister of the Gospel of Jesus Christ will say with the blessed Lord and Master, whose motto you have placed as a beacon light at the head of your paper: "In secret have I said nothing." Hereafter count us a bitter enemy of this damnable society of sin and wickedness; and never will we give one cent of our money to a minister of the Gospel who is a Mason. H.

OUR MAIL.

H. Johnson, Delevan, Wis., writes:

"One Masonic minister can do a great deal to encourage secret societies. The other day at a funeral service he said to the audience that the deceased was a Christian and a Mason as every wise man should be. Notwithstanding the deceased had said to Deacon Irish while living that he had not attended a lodge for years, and that there was no good in them."

James Donaldson, London, Ont., writes:

"It is hard to find a man here who will encourage me at all in my efforts to propagate Anti-masonic literature. May the good Lord help. He is in a few instances encouraging me by success in this work."

Daniel Jones, Galesburg, Ill., writes:

"The Cynosure ought to be in every family in the land. It makes me tremble when I think of the ruin that Freemasonry and kindred societies are working in the land. The paper is a welcome visitor to our home. It has been the means of making one young man hate Masonry. May God bless it as it goes forth to battle for the right."

Samuel Y. Miller, Contreras, O., writes:

"Bro. Givens gave us a lecture at Sand Run Hall, our township property, on the evenings of Nov. 6th, 7th and 9th, which we have reason to believe have awakened the people to a sense of the evils of secrecy."

H. H. Shields, Rock, Ia., writes:

"I hope to send you two or three subscriptions soon. I am a United Brethren itinerant preacher of the Iowa Conference. I am in full sympathy with this reform. I want to stand with those in the front ranks."

Henry Archer, McCleary, O., writes:

"The cause is prospering here."

N. Bingham, Oweonta. N. Y., writes:

"The people are so much under the power of the lodge that they dare not even sign the petition to Congress for fear it will hurt their business. . . I still trust in God who doeth all things well and in his own good time."

B. Perrine, Perrine Corners, Pa., writes:

"Stand firm for the right, truth, and principle, and may the God of the Bible sustain you."

Levi Hines, Rogersville, Ind., writes:

"I am making considerable effort to procure subscribers for your very valuable paper, and I think I will have more success when I can get some more tracts to disseminate among my neighbors and friends to loosen the scales from their eyes."

James A. Clark, Prospect, Pa., writes:

"I am afraid this winter will be hard on all papers, especially those that advocate reforms."

We hope all who have such a fear (as it is not without reason), will follow this friend's example by sending us money.

Robert M. Huston, Irvington, Ill., writes:

"I get my paper weekly, which is a weekly treat. I love it because it teaches pure evangelical truth. It keeps Jesus Christ always between the sinner and God as the only medium of approach to the Father. Through him all the promises are yea and amen to them that believe."

T. J. Caldwell, Manhattan, Kan., writes:

"We have had some pretty lively discussions in the literary society of the Kansas State Agricultural College. The last discussion was on this petition whether it should be granted; decision in the affirmative. I have a copy of Finney on Masonry which is going the rounds, being read by the students. We have awakened quite an interest despite the efforts of the members of the fraternity, the President and a part of the professors being members. Still the good work must go on."

James A. Wallace, Camp Point, Ill., writes:

"We are eaten up with Masonry here, so to speak. Almost all the prominent men in the country belong to the Masonic or some other order, so that the church is suffering exceedingly from the effects of it. Why, you can hardly meet a man now but has the compass and G and the square on his coat collar, and he seems to think that it is enough to pass him into any society either on earth or in heaven. What folly! I sent last year and got some of J. W. Bain's little books and gave them out. Men say they were logical. He is a fine reasoner. He is in your city as you are aware. I think you have a good accession. I hope to remain a reader of the Cynosure for many years."

James Weir, Crystal, Ia., writes:

"They are rather strong on the grange question, but I take notice that it is quite a job to get them together since the novelty of the thing has worn off."

C. F. Wirt, Lewiston, Minn., writes:

"Dear Cynosure:—I want you to continue your weekly visits to my fireside, as you are engaged in a noble cause in which I have felt interested for many years. I hope that the works of darkness that are carried on through secret societies may be subdued and eradicated from civilization."

F. Leyde, Winsted, Minn., writes that the Whitney pamphlet itself is worth all the money the Cynosure costs.

Mrs. A. J. Miller, Milbury, O., writes:

"I will send in my renewal with a new subscriber, praying that all that renew their subscription may do the same."

W. W. Templeton, Huntsville, O., writes:

"I hope your subscription list may be increased a thousand fold."

He sends four new subscriptions in his letter.

Mary Good, Millersburg, Pa., writes that she obtained the names of only six legal voters on the petition. While we seek for long lists of names we would by no means despise or undervalue a few when they are on the right side. One with God is a majority. God honors himself by using feeble instruments.

J. M. Howard, Nashua, Ia., writes:

"I would not like to do without the paper. . . From the signs of the times I think it is time the people were waking up to their best interest."

Mrs. E. Thompson, Mid Prairie, Ia., writes:

"We as a family have been doing all that we can to circulate your paper. We have been taking it for two years next March, and we have but few numbers in the house. I have sent them in every direction. We have been the means of some sending for your paper. . I earnestly believe that the day is near at hand when Masonry will cease and religion reign in its stead. . . Rev. Henry Wallace, of Morning Sun, gave a good lecture in opposition to Masonry a short time ago."

Mrs. Thompson says that a grange chaplain recently spent the night at their house. Her husband asked him to lead in family worship but he replied that he was not in the habit of doing so. (Yet he would read prayers in the grange.)

A. F. Worden, Nashua, Ia., writes:

"My heart is in the work, and I pray God will sustain you in this glorious cause. I hate the slimy serpent in all of its forms. I am getting along finely with the petition."

By the time our readers receive this paper we will probably have sent petitions to more than three thousand five hundred different persons. Some who receive them cannot get many names, but we hope that very many will obtain from fifty to five hundred apiece. You have the rest of January left to finish collecting them in.

A. Carlton, Kalamazoo, Mich., writes:

"I live in a land of secret societies—Masons, Odd-fellows and grangers. All are poison to Anti-masonry. I have been opposed to secret societies all my life."

During the past year Benj. Ulsh, of Silver Lake, Ind., has obtained eighty-seven different subscriptions for the Cynosure. (Many of them from three to six months.) He has sold one hundred and seventy-five books, and lives in a locality where money is scarce. We believe he will have to have the first place as a successful canvasser for the Cynosure this year. He reports sixty-nine names already collected on his petition, and writes:

"There is much work needed, and the laborers are comparatively few. May the Lord send forth more laborers into his vineyard."

R. D. Nichols, Janesville, Mich., writes:

"I have ninety-four names appended to the petition. Forty-five of them are legal voters. Two are the names of grangers, two of Odd-fellows, and one, that of a Freemason, if once in always in. What good will it do? is a question frequently asked. What is the object of it?"

In answer to the first question we reply: It will show the officers of our government and the young aspirants for office that there is a large body of men and women who will not tolerate secret combinations of citizens in a time of peace, believing with Wendel Philips, that, "They are a great evil; entirely out of place in a Republic," and that 'they should not be allowed to exist.'" We have not room now to say more.

We cannot but feel sure of a large number of petitioners when we receive word like the following from a man almost eighty-four years old.

E Darling, Paint Creek, Mich., writes:

"I have taken one tramp with the petitions having made a circuit of about twenty miles on foot. . . . It looks rather dark. Ignorance and prejudice is to be overcome, and who is sufficient for these things?"

J. V. Farwell said recently, in noon prayer meeting, that he felt like the negro who said, "If the Lord tells me to jump through a stone wall, it is my business to jump at it; and it is the Lord's business to carry me through."

Sophronia Durkee, Russell, Kan., writes:

"I have been much afflicted with sickness for the last six months. . . . But one thing I can do, I can ask the King of kings and Lord of lords to do; and as the work is his, and as he is able to work, and none can hinder, he it is that must do the work."

Elbert Marcy, Spottsylvania Court-House, Va., writes:

"I have taken the Cynosure from the beginning. . I like the change in form very much. . . The petition is almost a dead letter. . Those that signed the one against the corner-stone laying refuse. For since the election, when the conservatives or Democrats get liquor into their heads they talk very abusive; and most republicans keep very quiet, and will not say or do anything to irritate them; for nearly every man of business in this vicinity is a secret-society man and a conservative. I pity the colored people if they should get the next president."

Hiram Preston, Lincklaen, N. Y., writes:

"I was seventy-two last February, and my health is poor. I have been circulating the petitions sent to my son, Eli Preston, and I have got about two hundred names. My son was so driven with work that he could not attend to it."

B. Williams, Warren, Ill., writes:

"Anti-secret principles are gaining and growing in some localities. They are like hidden fires which will burst forth and carry all before them. There are many looking around to see how, where and when to move. Many persons tell me they would come out and take a stand against secretism if others would do the same, so that they would be safe in doing so."

J. A. Morehouse, Portland, Ind., writes:

"The cause of Christ and humanity is gaining ground in this county, and the Cynosure, instead of being despised as formerly, is now sought for even by secretists themselves. May the time soon come when oath-bound secrecy shall be banished from our land."

John Chapin, Palmyra, Wis., writes:

"My age is now eighty years, but I bid you God speed in your good work. If the clay tenement is frail, my spirit and wish to do good was never stronger. Philo Elsea is lecturing here against secret societies; has a good interest and audience."

The Sabbath School.

Lesson for Jan. 31, 1875.—Jericho Taken.

Joshua vi. 12-20.—Commit 13-16, 20; Primary verse 20.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"By faith the walls of Jericho fell down after they were compassed about seven days.—HEB. ii. 30.

TOPIC.—The Triumph of Faith.

QUESTION HELPS.

1.—What were the instructions given to Joshua? 3-5. Who gave them? Josh. v. 13-15. Who was this captain? How many days were the Israelites to go around the city? How many times each day? Were they to go each day the same number of times? How many times in all were they to circle the place? Who and what were in the procession? 8, 9. In going about the city what were the soldiers to do? 10. What were the priests to do? 8. Who composed the "rearward?" Num. x. 25. What do you think this silent procession was for? Did it end silently?

2.—What did Jericho have around it? Josh. ii. 15; vi. 5. Were the walls thick? Josh. ii. 15. If the walls were so thick that houses were built upon them don't you think that the people inside must have felt pretty secure? When the procession went around them day after day, how do you think they must have felt in looking on it? If you suppose they felt safe, read Josh. ii. 9-11, 24; v. 1.

3.—What was to happen to the city when it was taken? 17. "Accursed" means "devoted" to God, and all perishable and mortal things devoted to him were to be destroyed. What did happen to the city and its inhabitants? 21, 24. Why did God have the people all destroyed? Deut vii. 2-10. They worshiped idols, and did things too abominable to mention. But the worst thing of all is given in the last verse of that reference—they "hated" God. Read, also, verse 16 of the same chapter, and Deut. xx. 16-18. So also shall he do in time to come. Matt. xiii. 47-49.

4.—Who alone was saved? 25. Why? 17; ii. 1-16; Jas. ii. 25. Look in Heb. ii. 21 and you will find another reason? Which was the real reason? What sign had she on her house so that the Israelites might know it? chap. ii. 18. Was that a small thread? What would you call it nowadays? Was she a bad woman? Did she become good? What reason have you for believing that she became good? 25.

5.—What was to happen to him who should rebuild the city? 26? Did any one ever bring this curse upon himself? 1 Ki. xvi. 34. What was to happen to him who should keep for himself any of its treasures? 18. Who tried to hide some of them, and what became of him? vii. 9-26. —National S. S. Teacher.

JERICHO.—Situated some six or eight miles east of the river Jordan, in the midst of what was then a marvelously fertile and beautiful plain. A strongly fortified city. The walls were so massive that houses were built upon them. Josephus speaks of a temple in it full of gold and silver, and all kinds of costly treasures. Its gates were closely barred and guarded. The blockade was complete. The inhabitants, stricken with consternation, did not venture outside the walls. It was the most important city in Palestine at that time. Its position made it the key of the country. It was doubtless renowned for its splendor, its arts, and its advanced civilization; but, like the rest of the country, frightfully given over to idolatry and all manner of vices and crimes. "Methinks," says Bishop Hall, "I see how they called their council of war, debated all means of defense, gathered their forces, trained their soldiers, set strong guards to the gates and walls, and now would persuade one another that unless Israel could fly into their city, the siege was vain. So vain worldlings fancy their ramparts and barricades can keep out the vengeance of God, their blindness suffers them to look no further than the means; the supreme hand of the Almighty comes not within the compass of their fears. Every carnal heart is a Jericho shut up. God sits down before it, and displays mercies and judgments in sight of the walls thereof: it hardens itself in a willful security, and saith, 'Aha, I shall never be moved.'"—Illustrated Bible Studies.

Forty Years Ago.

The Puissant Sovereigns of France.

HENRY DANA WARD, 1829.

The Grand Commander of the same fraternity in France, will next claim our attention, with his Grand fellow-office bearers.

This man, Phillip Louis Joseph, Duke of Chartres, and afterward better known as Duke of Orleans, and Mons. Egalite, was one of the wickedest contrivers, meanest promoters, and worthiest victims of that moral earthquake, the French Revolution. Many might be pardoned, be praised for enterprising a great political reform in the despotic government of France; but not the Duke of Orleans. His designs were ambitious as his motives were revengeful. Having been scorned in an insult offered to the innocent Queen Antoinette, in which Orleans, played not the part of Joseph; and being angered with the King for neglect, he determined to sacrifice both, with the hope of succeeding himself to the government. (Russel's Mod. Europe, Part 3d, Let. 8)

For this purpose, he associated with the Masons, and with the party who sought to destroy Christianity. He was one of the founders of the lodge in Paris, which afterward became the celebrated Jacobin Club. (Robison's Proofs of a Conspiracy, p. 45.) He was Grand Master of the lodge at Lyons, Chevaliers Bienfaisants, for many years distinguished above all the lodges in France for its anti-Christian efforts, and cosmopolitcial discourses and opinions: a man, who "wasted his finances in the encouragement of fiction, and the subversion of social order. He was prodigal without generosity, splendidly ostentatious without dignity, and sensual without taste. Bold in vice and daring in fiction, he yet was destitute of that personal courage for which the nobles of France were long renowned." —(Russ. Mod. Eu. Part 3, Let. 8.)

He lived to give his vote for the death of his King and his cousin. "When the Duke of Orleans, who sat as a member of the convention under the abused name of Citizen L' Egalite, (Equality,) when this base Prince was asked his vote, there was a deep pause; and when the answer proved death, a momentary horror electrified the audience." (Scott's Napoleon, Chap. 13.) This was in the month of March, and in October, the Queen was borne with shouts to the scaffold, and in November, Mons. Egalite, himself, endured "the scoffs and insults of the multitude without emotion, and evinced in his last moments, a degree of courage which few thought him capable of displaying." (Russ. Mod. Eu. Part 3, Let. 12.)

Such was the Grand Commander of Freemasonry in France, a worthy associate of the Prussian Frederick, and pupil of Voltaire. Cardinal Prince de Rohan, "Master of the Grand Intelligence Lodge, and Sovereign Prince of Masonry, "next claims our attention. He is the same, no doubt, who was "a creature of Madame Du Barri, (the shameless companion of the 15th and dissolute Louis,) whose supposed inattention to the duties of his station, and imputed want of penetration, exposed him to public ridicule and censure." (Russel's Mod. Europe, Part 3d, Let. 1.) He is mentioned by Barruel, as one of the Prelates, favoring the Encyclopedists, the men whose watchword was "crush the wretch."

"Duc de Choiseul, right worshipful master of the Lodge of the Children of Glory, Grand Elect, Perfect, Master Knight, and Prince of Masons, &c." (Circular of Sublime Sovereigns. Dalcho's Orations, p. 70.)

"He was bold, ambitious, and enterprising; eager to aggrandize France, even in defiance of justice and humanity; prodigal in his administration, (he was prime minister,) and not sufficiently regardful of the accommodation, or welfare of the people." Russ. Mod. Eu. Part 3d, Let. 1.)

The Duke of Choiseul, during the whole time of his power, was the faithful adept, and admirer of Voltaire, who says to his fellow-conspirator, D' Alembert, Let. No. 68, 1760: "Do not fear opposition from the Duke of Choiseul; I repeat it, I do not mislead you: he will be proud of serving you." (Bar. vol. 1. p. 46.)

He aided the distribution and circulation of their anti-Christian works, and received therefor in a letter from Voltaire to Marmontel, 1767, this damnatory praise: Long live the Ministers of France; above all, long live the Duke of Choiseul." (Bar. vol. 1, p. 84)

Such are the four principal and leading men, among those named by our Sublime Sovereigns, Grand Dignitaries of Freemasonry. The names of the others, I cannot find in the histories within my command. They are of less note, or are unknown; but arguing, as it is right to do, the character of the body from its head, the infidel King of Prussia; and the character of its works from its unprincipled hands, the Duke of Orleans, and the Duke of Choiseul, what must the body be? La Corne, Daubertain, Topin, &c. &c.? These are the men, who were, (if the Sublime Sovereigns are to be believed,) instrumental of establishing Sublime Masonry among us; which is all one as Christianity: "founded on evangelical truth;" according to the Grand Chapter of New York, and Mr. Town. "What a wonder! Now Judas has become a preacher of faithfulness! This time he kisses his Master with sincerity! Sorry I am for his sincerity, that he should prefer secrecy and the midnight hour, for the display of his affection and fidelity; that he should come, too, from a conspiracy, not less distinguished for their hatred of the Gospel, than the Chief Priests and Sanhedrim were for their envy of the Lord of Glory.

PETITIONS.—We want the names of women as well as men on those petitions. Some do not understand this. Let us have large lists. They are beginning to come in already. Fill them up. Give every one an opportunity to sign.

THE TREASURER wishes the attention of friends in Indiana called to the necessity of sending immediately their contributions of the State work. KALAKAUA, THE ISLAND KING.

Fifty-four years ago the inhabitants of the Sandwich Islands, estimated at 800,000, were savages. The well-known American Missionary, Bingham says some of his associates turned with loathing from the sight of them, while the firmest of nerve exclaimed, "Can these be human beings!" The people were slaves to chiefs, and chiefs and people slaves to their kings, who had immolated as high as eighty human sacrifices at a time.

Kalakaua, who is now being fete d in this country, is King of that people reclaimed and made free by the Gospel of Christ. Last Friday night, the Chicago dailies inform us, this ruler of a people so lately reclaimed from idolatry, was taken into a Chicago lodge and its ceremonies, or "work" gone through with for his edification. The same thing had been done before in New York. And, to their utter disgrace, prominent citizens of Chicago sanctioned by their presence this paganism exhibited, as an American institution, to a reclaimed pagan. Every thing in the Chicago lodge was directly calculated to put the mind of this reclaimed barbarian on the back track to the heathenism of his fathers. The mock-murder of Hiram Abiff; the mock-solemn mystery; the savage and butcherly mutilations of his body, to which the candidate swears consent; the prayers to gods unknown, offered without Christ; the despotism; the abject obedience and subjugation of man to man; each, all, were simply the old heathen ideas reproducing themselves in this Christian land. And the lodge-splendor, costly gewgaws and trappings, so suited to the taste of barbarians already made, and to make men such when not, were paid for by money got under Christian laws and institutions, and largely earned or saved by wives and children in Christian families.

Where heathenism has to foot its own bills, human poverty and degradation makes idolaty bold and repulsive. Island idolatry had worn itself out. The islander set up his log on end, threw down his dead hog before it, whose stench soon repelled the worshipers. But this King, snatched by missionary effort from idolatry, paid a salary of $22,000 a year by a Christian people, saved like himself, is taken into a lodge-room by night in a Christian city of a Christian land, and taught, at the expense in large part of Christian laborers, that Americans who worship God through Christ by day, worship gods without Christ by night, in worship so contrived that it is boasted that all nations, heathen and Christian, may join in them, each worshiping his own deity and saved in the lodge above! Alas for our country, if idolatry, putting the true God on a level with idols in the Old World

"——has dried up realms to deserts."

"Of how much sorer punishment shall we be thought worthy."

THE AMERICAN MISSIONARY ASSOCIATION.

Do the readers of the Cynosure understand this organization? It was born in our national earthquake and cradled in its storms. A handful of native Africans on a Spanish slave-ship rose on their captors and killed all but two, Montez and Ruiz. These pirates applied to our government to re-enslave their heroic victims, who had been picked up by a United States vessel; and VanBuren and his Democrats were willing to give up the Africans to the mercy of the Spaniards. They were saved by the exertions of Lewis Tappan and John Quincy Adams; and the Supreme Court set them free.

What was to be done with them? No mission-board would take them up because they were negroes! Hence the organization of the American Missionary Association, which has stood for wronged humanity since like the cloud between Egypt and Israel, black on one side and blaze on the other. It was, in its origin, and still is, both a foreign and home board, taking care, not only of black but yellow people.

At Mount Vernon, Ohio, a few years since, the Association by resolution advised its colored beneficiaries not to join secret societies. At its late annual meeting in Clinton, Iowa, October, 1874, it adopted, by a unanimous or nearly unanimous vote, the following:

"Resolved, That we rejoice that the general advice against secret societies, given at Mount Vernon, Ohio, by this Association, and since re-affimed in substance in the A. M. A. magazine, has been well received and generally regarded by our brethren at the South; and we here renew that advice in application to our colleges and higher institutions at the South, hoping they will exclude the secret college fraternities as injurious to the best interests of learning and religion."

Our readers will at once see the vast significance of such a resolution by a society which has disbursed half a million dollars a year, and whose field of operations is so largely the lodge-ridden South.

It is to be hoped that the other gospelizing bodies and boards in this country will follow this illustrious example. All organizations and movements which ask the confidence and contributions of American Christians as gospel-propagating bodies, which yet make no issue against the grim idolatries of the lodge, intentionally or ignorantly, deceive the people, precisely as Paul would have done had he not objected to the worship of Diana, "the image which fell down from Jupiter."

SHERIDAN AS A REFORMER.

Famous as have been General Sheridan's warlike deeds, none will, we believe, ultimately reflect greater honor on his judgment than the following despatch:

HEADQUARTERS MILITARY DIVISION OF THE MISSISSIPPI,
NEW ORLEANS, Jan. 5, 1875.

The Hon. W. W. Belknap, Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.:

I think the terrorism now existing in Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas could be entirely removed and confidence and fair-dealing established by the arrest and trial of the ringleaders of the armed White Leagues. If Congress would pass a bill declaring them banditti, they could be tried by a military commission. The leaders of this banditti, who murdered men here on the 14th of September, and more recently at Vicksburg, Miss., should, in justice to law and order, and the peace and prosperity of this southern part of the country, be punished. It is possible that, if the President would issue a proclamation declaring them banditti, no further action need be taken, except that which would devolve upon me. (Signed) P. H. SHERIDAN,
Liutenant-General U. S. Army.

Neither is it probable that any past or future public act he may perform will call out such wide comment and denunciation. The Democratic Governors all around, from the venerable Allen, of Ohio, to the would-be magistrate McEnery, of Louisiana, unite in lifting up their voices in solemn protest at such audacious demands. Congress has given day after day to the discussion of the issues in New Orleans, and something like the old times of slavery presumption has been experienced in the arrogance of some Democratic members. Even Sheridan's friends telegraphed him, it is reported, that he was making himself ridiculous by his attacks on the White League.

But the facts in the case are coming to the surface, and will continue to do so, we believe, to the full vindication of Sheridan's judgment of the order and advice for its suppression.

From the voluminous despatches and testimony we shall attempt to give clear proof to our readers of the infamous character of the secret orders at the South and their connection with the Freemasons. The extracts from the published constitutions and declarations of various White League lodges was published in these columns on the 14th of September last. These extracts state that the Leagues were arrayed "in the name of white civilization" "for the protection of our own race from the daily increasing encroachments of the negro." They called on all the "men of our race" to unite with us in an earnest effort to re-establish a white man's government," and regarded it as a "sacred and political duty" to "socially proscribe all white men who unite themselves with the Radical party." The whole movement was a political one to re-establish the slave power by Masonic art. To accomplish this they hesitated at nothing. At the instigation of the Leagues eighty or ninety of the principal citizens of New Orleans signed the following:

"The undersigned agree to use all our influence to induce our employes to vote the White Man's ticket, and in case of their refusal to do so, to discharge them from our service, and refuse hereafter to renew any contracts with them; and we further agree to countenance, associate, or trade with the merchants who sell supplies to persons who allow their employes to vote the Radical ticket"

From social and political proscription they passed naturally and quickly to violence and murder. The massacre at Coushatta and of the 14th of September were neither more nor less than murder. "There are localities in this Department where the very air has been impregnated with assassination for some years," telegraphs General Sheridan on Jan. 6th, and in another dispatch, "Human life has been held too cheaply in this state for many years." A dispatch giving the substance of his report to the War Department of political murders in Louisiana says:

"He commences by the statement that since 1868 between three and four thousand men were murdered in the parishes because of political views entertained by them. In proof of this he makes a detailed statement of murders which occurred in different districts, reciting a number of cases in which unarmed and defenseless negroes were shot down in cold blood by desperate white men. These incidents are introduced for the purpose of proving that a state of lawlessness exists in Louisiana, and that the lives of men attached to the Republican party were not safe here. The General charges the White League with being responsible for most of the bloodshed and crime referred to. He denounces that organization in strong terms. The report is a calm, dispassionately-written document. Many of the facts contained in it were evidently derived from the reports of the Congressional investigating committee who have from time to time visited the State. The telegraphic report is only the forerunner of a long and detailed statement of political murders which the General is now preparing, and which will be transmitted to the War Department."

General Sheridan has no partisan interest in the Louisiana quarrel. He is only present in the interest of peaceful and righteous authority, and what interest he can have in misrepresenting the actual state of the case cannot be imagined.

But further facts have been unearthed to explain the White League. Gen. F. N. Ogden testified as follows, before the sub-committee of investigation from Congress:

I am commanding officer of the White League in this city; the object and purposes of the White League are clearly defined in their constitution. It was established in July, 1874, and we called it a White League because we could only rely upon white people in our condition; with political offices we have nothing to do; in the city of New Orleans our roll will call from 2,500 to 2,800 men; I have organized out of these two regiments of infantry and one of artillery; we have officers for these regiments; Gov. Penn authorized men to organize a militia when he was acting Govornor. I was under Gov. Penn's orders on the 14th of September; some of the organizations now are armed; I can't say how much, as I have not received my reports; we have no artillery, only what we made ourselves for the 14th of September. . . .

"Before election I summoned my staff and a few other gentlemen to take steps to police the city; on the 2d of November I divided my command into three divisions, one under the command of Col. Behan, another under Col.

Gwynn, and a third under Major——; they were to place 15 men near each poll to prevent disturbances; I did this because I was told that measures would be taken to create a quarrel; the Leagues in the State are not under my command, though I believe they would obey me if I issued orders."

One or two statements in the above should be noted. First, "with political offices we have nothing to do." The re-iterated statements of the League falsifies this, as does Mr. Ogden's own action in patroling the city of New Orleans on the day of election. Second; it appears that the only color of legal existence the Leagues can claim is the order of a bogus Lieut-governor, Penn, who assumed authority for a few hours on the 14th of September last, when the State forces had been shot down and driven from the streets of New Orleans by this armed secret clan.

Next is an extract from an appeal of the New Orleans board of underwriters published after the ejection of illegal members from the floor of the Louisiana Legislature by command of Gov. Kellogg, whereby the majority in that body had its proper authority:

We give our assurance to our brother underwriters at the North and West that we claim to be loyal citizens in the United States, and as such we are a law-loving and a law-abiding people, and that life and property are as safe with us as with them; for the truth of which we confidently appeal to the noble army of Knights Templar from every State in the Union who recently visited our city; that we cannot but express our surprise that any one occupying the position of Gen. Sheridan should presume to such knowledge of alleged important facts upon such brief opportunities as he possibly could have during the short time he has been at the South, and the only excuse we find for such utterances is a suggestion that comes to us this morning from New York, that this dispatch was written in Washington, and sent to Gen. Sheridan before he left his Northern command.

A third item is the statement of James H. Hopkins, member of Congress elect from Pittsburgh, Pa. This is from a special despatch to the Chicago Times on the 8th inst:

Pittsburgh, Jan. 7.—This afternoon Mr. James H. Hopkins, grand master of the Knights Templar of the United States, who accompanied the noble army of Knights Templar to New Orleans recently, was interviewed regarding Louisiana afairs. He said that he had only incidentally met Mr. Adams; but there was a man for whom he seemed to entertain the highest respect, and that was R H. Marr, chairman of the committee of safety. He stated that Mr. Marr is a man 70 years of age, white-haired, and very much respected by everybody in New Orleans. He had had several talks with him about the engagement on the 14th of September. Mr. Hopkins expressed surprise that, after obtaining power, Mr. Marr had been so well able to control the people. This matter was explained by Marr, who said there was nothing of the riotous element in the White League; that they are men of intelligence, and only needed a suggestion as to what was proper to do and it was carried out. On a suggestion as to what should be done, said Marr, every man assented, and of course undertook to execute the orders of the White League. On the occasion of the riot in September last, he rode along the lines when they were drawn up, and impressed upon them that there should be no violence; that under no force of circumstances was there to be any resistance to the United States troops. In the course of the conversation Mr. Marr claimed that the people of the State were loyal to the general government; that there was no conflict at all between them and the United States authorities, and should be none; it was simply a question between the people of Louisiana and men who had usurped authority over them and were plundering them. He stated what is already known. When the United States troops were drawn into line, the White League presented arms and saluted them.

Reporter—Did you meet any banditti?

Mr. Hopkins—None that I know of; if I did, they were well disguised as very hospitable, intelligent and agreeable gentlemen. I spent two weeks in New Orleans, and, after observations and having mingled with the people, have failed to see any such disposition as Gen. Sheridan discovered after two days visit. During my stay, while I met men from Louisiana and all the Southern States, I did not hear a single sentiment of disloyalty expressed towards the national government. I met many who had served in the confederate army, and they said that upon any occasion upon which the United States needed recruits, they would furnish three to one to the North in proportion to population, to defend the national flag.

This Mr. Marr is a leading spirit in the Louisiana troubles and in the White League. As chairman of a "committee of seventy" for the ostensible purpose of guarding the public safety he issues proclamations to the people of Louisiana with all the authority of a chief executive. On the 6th of January he waited on Gen. Sheridan, who expressed his determination to break up this secret, armed and insurrectionry order. Marr replied that the White League was "ready to surrender to the civil authorities," the significance of which remark being nothing, as the only civil authority that Leagues recognize is themselves.

Had we no other evidence of the near relation of the secret banditti of the South with the Masonic lodge the above is sufficient proof. The Ku-Klux were sheltered by Freemasonry, as the testimony of Gen. Howard and the investigations of Congress clearly proved; and the White Leagues find references for good character and apologists in the ranks of the lodge. The above items explain the almost universal outcry against Sheridan; he has made a raid upon the secret camp whose posts are established all through the country. In attacking one he threatens all, hence the universal howl. But the utter annihilation of these secret bands by such swift and vigorous policy as he recommends is the only safety of the South. North Carolina only had peace when the United States troops hunted out and broke up every Ku-Klux den. Sheridan's firm position has already given more security in New Orleans than has been known for months. A Republican mass meeting met last week to give their encouagement to his efforts. Such meetings, peacefully held, have been for a long time impossible. His advice is just for it would secure the punishment of the murderers of September 14th, whose social and political standing shields their crime while they are the heroes of the League. They also attempted the subversion of the State government by an insurrectionary seizure of the Lower House on the 5th inst. Had the attempt succeeded, it was their plan to recognize the Conservative Senate of two years ago, and with the House and Senate in their posession they intended to impeach Kellogg and the other Republican officials and obtain complete control.

The opinion of Secretary Bristow on the case is valuable. While Attorney-General of Kentucky he met and defeated the Ku-Klux of that State, so that hundreds of the order voluntarily abandoned it under the protection of the courts. His opinion is thus given in a despatch:

He is not inclined to palliate or soften the offenses of the White League. He says of that organization that it is wicked and inexcusable, and he believes that it is far more extensive and more dangerous in its character than is generally supposed. He thinks that in a Government of law any armed organization not made in pursuance of law is dangerous to the public peace. He would go to the very verge of constitutional power in breaking up the White League organization. He does not see that it is in any respect better in its purpose than the Ku-Klux organization, though it presents an appearance of more respectability.

That Congress will take such action as Sheridan recommends is too much to hope; nor is it likely that President Grant will urge it. Senator Logan, in a powerful speech replying to the impeachments of the Democracy, said significantly that he believed the furious outcry in the Senate, in the New York press, and elsewhere showed there was a kind of understsnding that this revolution was to be made to overthrow the Louisiana Legislature. He "would not say that the understanding was among the Democrats of the Senate, but it was somewhere." Just where it was the people may sometime learn to their surprise.

President Day.—A letter from this well known educator and theological writer appears on our first page. Jeremiah Day was born in New Preston, Conn., in 1773. He entered Yale College in 1789, but an early completion of his course was prevented by ill health. He graduated in 1795, and taught for three years. In 1798 he was elected to a tutorship in William College and in 1801 to the professorship of mathematics and natural philosophy in Yale College. On the death of President Dwight in 1817 he was chosen his successor in the presidency of Yale and thus continued until, from feeble health, he resigned in 1846. "Though that venerable institution," says a biographical sketch, "has been deemed peculiarly fortunate in its presidents it may with truth be said that it has at no time been more prosperous than under the administration of Dr. Day. His learning and talents, united to great kindness of heart, soundness of judgment, and urbanity of manner, secured alike the love and respect of his thousands of pupils, all of whom looked upon him more as a father and friend than as a mere teacher and guide in the ways of knowledge." Dr. Day was distinguished as a mathematician and a clear and vigorous thinker on all subjects to which his attention was turned. He was the author of several popular text-books in mathematics, and also several philosophical works. His contributions to theological literature were a volume of sermons and occasional articles in the periodical press.

NOTES.

—A new contributor on lodge tactics and policy has a place on the third page of this number. As he speaks excathedra, having filled various offices in the lodge, from the Master down, in this city, and also numerous duties under appointment of the Grand Lodge of the State, the presentation of the case from his stand-point is interesting and valuable. We hope he will be able to continue these contributions as suggested in the close of the article, and so present the truth as to lead many now trembling under its conviction and personal fears to throw off a galling yoke and assert their manhood.

—Brother G. Bolander writes from Warren, Ind., that J. T. Kiggins gave a "grand lecture in that place, and organized a local association through which the reform is extending in influence and power. Will Bro. B. see that the names of the new Association and of its officers are sent to the Corresponding Secretary of the Nat'l Association?

—The funeral of Gerrit Smith took place in Peterboro, N. Y., on the afternoon of Thursday, the 31st ult. The Rev. S. R. Calthrop, of Syracuse, was the officiating clergyman, and paid an earnest and affecting tribute to the life and character of the deceased. The services were very brief. The remains were viewed by hundreds of people, and the casket was borne to the grave by colored men. The pall bearers were Gen. John J. Knox, Knoxboro; Hon. Charles B. Sedgwick, Syracuse; Hon. Henry A. Foster; Hon. D. C. Littlejohn, Hon. Hamilton Littlefield, Oswego; Gen. T. F. Petrie, Hon. Caleb Calkens, John Campbell, Jeremiah Bump, Peterboro; Dr. M. B. Jarvis, Canastota; Hon. Benjamin F. Chapman, Clockville; Noah Brister, Peterboro; William Kinney and George Bland, of Geneva. The three last mentioned were colored men. The interment was in the Peterboro cemetery.

—Rev. Joseph Travis, president of the Iowa District of the Free Methodist church whose opportunities for observation in that State give great force to his opinion, says: "The granger movement has made the State of Iowa very money poor. Thousands of dollars taken out of the State for Dispensations, deputy's fees and grange furniture; thousands foolishly spent in conventions, and worse still, hundreds of thousands driven out of circulation that would have been expended in the building new, and extending existing railroads, and strange fact, the roads then under contract to be built, and those immediately pending such contracts were, with scarce any exception, from their location and other circumstances, necesarily competative with already existing roads; and now the reflux influence of Western grangerism is being felt by the tens of thousands of the unemployed operatives of the iron and coal regions of the East, the products of whose labor was demanded West, until these foolish, but intensely selfish movements, caused the late financial revolution. God has graciously given good crops throught the State as a rule, and is giving fair prices save for wheat (which I think he intends his poor shall have cheap) or we shall be financially ruined."

The Home Circle.

Life in Christ.

I walk along the crowded streets, and mark
The eager, anxious faces;
Wond'ring what this man seeks, what that man craves,
In earthly places.

Do I want anything that they are wanting?
Is each of them my brother?
Could we hold fellowship, speak heart to heart,
Each to the other?

Nay, but I know not! only this I know,
That sometimes merely crossing
Another's path where life's tumultuous waves
Are ever tossing,

He, as he passes, whispers in mine ear
One magic sentence only,
And in the awful loneliness of crowds
I am not lonely.

Ah! what a life is theirs who live in Christ;
How vast the mystery.
Reaching in height to heaven, and in its depth
The unfathomable sea!

Made a Man of Him.

There was a great revival in S. Dr. Hale's wife was converted, and the doctor also indulged a hope. Both asked membership in the Baptist church. There was but one objection: the doctor kept a grocery and drug store, and sold liquor also. His partner had no conscience about it; he had, but lacked resolution and independence to obey his convictions. That was his weakness in all matters, and made him a tool of others, a creature of circumstance. The church would not receive a rumseller; he disliked to be rejected. What could he do? Leave his business? Sacrifice his large stock of liquors? Risk all for Christ? Such heroic action was too high for him. His nature, his business, his pocket, his habits, were against it. He wished to be saved, desired to be a Christian, but never dreamed of sacrifices. The seed was in stony ground, and bade fair to wither and die.

He proposed a compromise. Just like him! Just like thousands of others! They kept back part of the price. He would sell out the stock on hand, and buy no more. The church was satisfied. Satan laughed. He likes double-minded professors. The doctor's plan just suited him. The judgment of the deacon suited him. All was working as he desired. But the pastor, Dr. I——, spurned the compromise, and refused to baptize such a rumseller. That spoiled the nice arrangement. He would give the doctor his cow, his horse; he would share his last loaf with him if the latter became poor for Christ's sake; but he would not baptize him until he was totally purged from the rum traffic.

This was a moral shock to the church and to the doctor, but from the right direction. It caused great thinking, deep feeling, some discussion. The doctor was aroused; his whole nature was stirred; new thoughts and feelings broke into his soul. Christianity, duty, life appeared to him in a new, a higher, brighter light. He accepted the new revelation. He gave the pastor his hand; his soul burst the snare of compromise; with a will he made the sacrifice of rum and his business, and stood erect for Christ.

The people were surprised, the pastor delighted, the doctor was calm and exultant. He was baptized, and emphatically entered upon his new life. He was a new man, and from that time developed new and nobler powers; excelled his former self in all manly qualities; took a high position in society; became a leader in all good works; a counsellor, a friend and helper to the weak and troubled. He found other business, prospered and was happy. By the integrity and courage of his pastor was born again. He was before but half converted; he had not laid all upon the altar; but this test brought him to the Savior's feet.

There are thousands in the church, mere pigmies, weak, worldly, and vacillating, because they at the outset shrink from the demands of duty. Christ's way seems hard and exacting, and they choose a compromise, and are trying to serve God and mammon. Could they be brought to a square, unreserved consecration, a choice of Christ at the loss of all things, it would bless them as it did Doctor Hale.

The test may have been offered and dodged. It is always offered in some form, but many decline it, and are, therefore, weak and wicked. How many seek first the kingdom of heaven, prefer Christ to any and all other things, sacrifice property, pleasure, and honor, for the Gospel? The entirely consecrated in the church are few; compromisers are many. The whole tone of religious life needs to be elevated, a general heart-searching is demanded; more enthusiasm and singleness of purpose are essential to the development of talent, deliverance from sin, and success in converting the world. Who is ready to give up all for Christ? Who will forsake all that he has, and use all his powers and means in the service of the Lord?
—Bible Lesson.

Sir Isaac Newton.

Sir Isaac Newton, a most celebrated English philosopher and mathematician, and one of the greatest geniuses that ever appeared in the world, was descended from an ancient family in Lincolnshire, where he was born, in the year 1642. His powers of mind were wonderfully comprehensive and penetrating. Fontenelle says of him, that, "In learning mathematics, he did not study Euclid, who seemed to him too plain and simple, and unworthy of taking up his time. He understood him almost before he read him; a cast of his eye on the contents of the theorems of that great mathematician, seemed to be sufficient to make him master of them." Several of his works mark a profundity of thought and reflection, that has astonished the most learned men. He was highly esteemed by the University of Cambridge, and was twice chosen to represent that place in Parliament. He was also greatly favored by Queen Anne, and by George the First. The princess of Wales, afterwards queen consort of England, who had a turn for philosophical inquiries, used frequently to propose questions to him. The princess had a great regard for him, and often declared that she thought herself happy to live at the same time as he did, and to have the pleasure and advantage of his conversation.

The amiable quality of modesty stands very conspicuous in the character of this great man's mind and manners. He never spoke, either of himself or others, in such a manner as to give the most malicious censurers the least occasion even to suspect him of vanity. He was candid and affable; and he did not assume any airs of superiority over those with whom he associated. He never thought either his merit, or his reputation, sufficient to excuse him from any of the common offices of social life. Though he was firmly attached to the Church of England, he was averse to the persecution of Nonconformists. He judged of men by their conduct; and the true schismatics, in his opinion, were the vicious and the wicked. This liberality of sentiment did not spring from the want of religion; for he was thoroughly persuaded of the truth of revelation, and amidst the great variety of books which he had constantly before him, that which he loved the best, and studied with the greatest application, was the Bible. He was, indeed, a truly pious man, and his discoveries concerning the frame and system of the universe, were applied to him to demonstrate the being of a God, and to illustrate his power and wisdom. He also wrote an excellent discourse, to prove that the remarkable prophecy of Daniel's "weeks," was an express prediction of the coming of the Messiah, and that it was fulfilled in Jesus Christ.

The testimony of the pious and learned Dr. Doddridge to the most interesting part of this great man's charter, cannot be omitted on the present occasion: "According to the best information," says he, "whether public or private, I could ever obtain, his firm faith in the Divine revelation, discovered itself in the most genuine fruits of substantial virtue and piety, and consequently gives us the justest reason to conclude, that he is now rejoicing in the happy effects of it, infinitely more than in all the applause which his philosophical works have procured him, though they have commanded a fame lasting as the world."

He died in the eighty-fifth year of his age. In his principles and conduct through life, he has left a strong and comfortable evidence, that the highest intellectual powers harmonize with religion and virtue; and that there is nothing in Christianity but what will abide the scrutiny of the soundest and most enlarged understanding.

Feminine Personals.

We boast of our system of education; we have female high schools, female colleges, female medical schools, and female heavens. Our girls are refined, learned, and wise; they can sing, dance, play the piano, paint, talk French, Italian, and all the soft languages, write poetry, and love like Venuses. They are ready to be courted at ten years, and can be taken from school and married at fifteen, and divorced at twenty. They make splendid shows on bridal tours, can coquette and flirt at the watering places, and shine like angels at winter parties. But heaven be kind to the poor wretch that marries in the fashionable circles! What are they at washing floors? Oh! we forgot nobody has bare floors now; how vulgar it would be! What are they at making bread and boiling beef? Why, how thoughtless we are, to be sure, they will board or have servants. What are they at mending old clothes? But there we are again, the fashions change so often that nobody has old clothes but the rag-men and paper-makers now. What are they at washing babies' faces and pinning up their trousers? We repeat, we have come to a point where young men hesitate and grow old before they can decide whether they can marry and afterward keep clear of bankruptcy and crime. What is the consequence? There are more persons living a single life. Are there more leading a virtuous life? It is time for mothers to know that the extravagance they encourage is destructive to the virtue of their children; that all the foolish expenditures are, instead of answering that end, tending to destroy the institution of marriage altogether.

Negro Superstitions.

Just after reconstruction the colored people all over the South manifested a great desire to have their children educated, and to this end sent them regularly to school when teachers were provided for them. Within the last year or two the negro schools in Alabama have not been properly maintained by the Government, no effort has been made to encourage parents to have their children taught, and from these and other causes they have become very indifferent as to the instruction of their offspring. Before the war, masters who had any consideration for their slaves did what they could to render them bright and intelligent. Now the poor people have no one to care for them. As stated above, the Government does not provide them with schools. The religious exercises consist in madly jumping and shouting in the so-called "holy dance," and, living as they do in remote and wild places, it is, perhaps, not to be wondered at that they are ignorant and superstitious. Indeed, nearly all their actions are controlled and influenced by some strange and supernatural belief. If a hog is killed on the wane of the moon they believe the flesh will dry up and the fat melt away. Soap must always be made when the moon is increasing or it will not wash clothes well. If a rabbit runs across the path of a negro at dusk he immediately makes a cross in the ground with a stick and spits in the center of it. They will not tell why they do this, simply saying, "The cross removes the rabbit spell." Another peculiar belief is that if a duck dies in a woman's hands some sickness will surely overtake her before the next new moon. Their belief in the efficacy of charms is very strong. The other day while walking in the woods near Montgomery, I met a young negro who had a red bead and a large piece of lead fastened to a strong cord and tied around his neck. He told me that he was troubled by frequent and long-continned bleedings from the nose, and that the red bead—"blood bead" he called it—and lead had been given him by an old woman doctor. She had assured him that as long as he wore the charm his nose would never bleed again, and said he, "Sure'nough I hasn't had no trouble since."

Many of the poor creatures when sick entertain the belief that they have been "tricked," as they call it, and others are sure that their illnees is caused by some reptile having crawled into their body. There is one old negro on a plantation near Mount Meigs who stated positively that a "conjure doctor" has made a water snake enter his leg. This was done, he says, because he promised his old master that he would vote the Democratic ticket. Would not this be a good field for missionaries?—N. Y. Times.

Law-Maxims Worth Knowing.

Administrators are liable to account for interest on funds in their hands, although no profit should have been made upon them, unless the exigencies of the estate rendered it prudent that they should hold the funds uninvested.

Children's Corner.

Two Lads.

Two schoolfellows, of equal age,
Were 'prenticed in one day:
The one was studiously inclined,
The other boy was gay.

The pocket-money each received
Was just the same amount;
And how they both expended it
I briefly shall recount.

Whilst George was smoking his cigars,
And sauntering abont
With yonths as idle as himself,
Shutting all knowledge out,

At the Mechanic's Institute,
And with his books at home,
Tom wisely spent his leisure hours,
Nor cared the streets to roam.

One eve, when their apprenticeship
Had nearly passed away,
George at his friend Tom's lodgings called,
An hour or two to stay.

He entered smoking his cigar,
Ill-mannerly enough,
And staring round the room he blew
A most portentous puff.

"Why, Tom!" he cried, with much surprise,
"Is your old uncle dead?
And left you cash to buy those books
That round the walls are spread?"

"Oh, no," said Tom, "I bought those books
With what my friends allowed;
Had you not smoked away your cash,
You might the same have showed!"

And now, young growing boys, do heed
The counsels of a friend,
Who begs you'll not for dirty smoke
Your health and money spend.

A Beautiful Example—A Polite Little Boy.

He jumps up directly, when an elderly gentleman or lady enters a car, stage, or steamboat, who wants a seat. It is precisely so in the sanctuary or in any public gathering. No matter where this little boy is, he is sure to wear a sweet, heavenly smile of courtesy and genuine, gospel politeness. It is an honor to his parents; it shows his bringing up, his early training. He honors gray hairs also.

"Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honor the face of the old man, and fear thy God. I am the Lord." Lev. xix. 32.

The politeness everywhere shown to the ladies, makes a poor excuse for the inattention to old age, in steamboats, railroad cars, hotels, and elsewhere, and it is not an unfrequent occurrence to see a man scarcely able to walk, supporting himself in a car by the back of a seat, or by a post on a steamboat, for lack of the seat which a strong, young man occupies near him. We saw a lady give up her seat to an old gentleman once, in such a case, and instantly half a dozen chairs were offered her by the gentlemen who had remained motionless before. Americans know what politeness is, if they do not practice it.

The other day we were riding in a crowded railway carriage. At one of the stations an old man entered and was looking for a seat, when a boy, ten or twelve years of age, rose up and said, "Take my seat, sir." The offer was accepted, and the infirm, old man sat down.

"Why did you give me your seat?" he inquired of the boy.

"Because you are old, sir, and I am a boy," was the reply. The passengers were very much pleased. For our part, we wanted to seize hold of the little fellow, and press him to our bosom.

"I almost think the angels,
Who tend life's gardens fair,
Drop down the sweet wild blossoms
That bloom around us here."

Fathers and mothers should be honored; old age reverenced. "Obedience to parents" should be the watchword of every son and daughter, from the least to the greatest.

"Speak gently to the aged one,
Grieve not the care-worn heart;
The sands of life are nearly run,
Let such in peace depart."

Finally young friends, be polite or courteous to everybody; true politeness is giving attention to little things, little acts of self-denial, kindness and love, striving to make everybody happy. It is benevolence flowing from a noble, generous, pious heart. It is, in a word, doing to others as we would that others should do to us.

"This is the sum of every part,
To love our God with all our heart;
That we should love our neighbor too,
And what we wish from him should do.

'Tis short, and sweet, and good, and plain,
Easy to learn and to retain;
May grace divine our souls renew,
And 'twill be sweet to practice too.

D. F. Newton.

Parrots.

We think parrots very pretty, amusing creatures, especially if they can talk well, but in their own country, people do not like them so much. You know we seldom see more than one or two at once, and we can easily put up with the noise they make; but I think none of us would like to live in a house where there were more than one or two. They make such a dreadful noise when they are angry that a great number of them would almost drive us wild. Imagine, then, what a screaming a large flock of these birds would make!

It is very funny to see how proud parrots often are when they have learned to say a few words; how conceited they look when they have repeated their lesson more than usually well, and how they twist their little heads around to see if people are as pleased as they ought to be.

A traveler journeying in South America once saw a tame parrot, which had escaped from its cage, and having found out a number of its cousins in the neighborhood, was exhibiting all its newly-acquired knowledge to them, to their intense delight. A large crowd had assembled to see him—mind I do not mean a crowd of men or women, or even of little children, but a great number of his old friends and relatives—who, no doubt, had come to tell him how glad they were that he had contrived to escape from his horrid prison, and perhaps to invite him to stay with them. And so Polly, to reward them for their kindness and good will, was showing them all he could do and how well he could talk. Now, as he had only learned Portuguese, it would not be of much use for me to tell you what the words were, even if I knew, which I do not; but whatever they were, the traveler says that they delighted the other parrots immensely, so that the screaming was frightful—every one trying which could imitate the words best; and altogether making such a deafening uproar as you never heard.

Then Polly showed them how to laugh, rolling his head from side to side, shaking as if convulsed with laughter, and screeching, "Ha, ha, ha!" till the wood rang with his voice, and those of his admiring friends.

But remember, that though parrots are certainly very clever birds, they do not know what many of the words mean, nor think much of what they say. And in this respect little children are sometimes very much like parrots. I do not mean that they cannot understand what they are taught, but that they think it too much trouble to try to do so. But that is very silly, for little children have sense and understanding, and they ought to use both; so mind you never let it be said of you that you learn things like a parrot.—Missionary Visitor.

A True Story of a Cat.

"On a sultry day in July, a gentleman sits at a window, looking out upon a lawn which has a fine growth of shrubbery. Underneath the bushes, at a distance of half a dozen yards, he perceives two cats with their kittens, stretched out for rest in the shade. One of the cats rolls about uneasily, and seems drooping, as if sick. Presently she takes her kitten in her mouth, and bringing it to the other cat, lays it beside her, close to her own kittens, and then mews piteously. Now there seems to be general excitement; the other cat mews back, lays her paw on the newly-arrived kitten, and licks it. All the kittens move, and mew faintly. The first cat then goes staggeringly, to a distance of about ten yards, and lays down herself. After a minute or two, she does not move, nor seems to breathe. The gentleman went to her, and found her dead. Then he watches the other cat to see what she will do. He finds her always taking the best care of the adopted kitten, feeding, defending and caressing it as her own, until it arrives at the estate of cat-hood, when kittens are generally turned off to provide for themselves. O, ye who sneer at bruit instinct, as being only another name for sensuous want, having no process of thought in it—consider this history of a cat, and ask yourselves if it is indeed so far beneath your vaunted intelligence as to merit from you as mean a contempt."

As the narrator of the above was, himself, the eye-witness of the facts, I need say nothing as to their authenticity. It is surely a wonderful and a touching story.—Our Dumb Animals.

THE PEACEMAKER.—Boys, you all know what this means. Remember what the Saviour says: "Blessed are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." And "These things I command you, that ye love one another." Also "Be kindly affectioned one to another with brotherly love, in honor preferring one another." Don't forget these beautiful words, for the Redeemer loved little children, and said, "Of such is the kingdom of heaven."

Religious Intelligence.

—Rev. C. L. Thompson, of the Fifth Presbyterian Church of Chicago, has been associated with Dr. F. L. Patton on the editorial staff of the Interior.

—A revival of considerable interest has been in progress in Greenup, Ky., which resulted in the addition of sixty-eight to the different churches.

—The Advance of this city has added Prof. S. C. Bartlett to its editorial corps. Prof. Swing, the "independent Presbyterian, whose liberal preaching caused so much wrangling in the Chicago Presbytery, and Washington Gladden, late of the Independent, are special contributors.

—About 670 converts signed the covenant, as the result of Mr. Hammond's labors in Galesburg, Ill. But six students in Knox College are left without hope in Christ. The evening meetings during his stay were held in the Opera House, and were attended by over three thousand persons each evening.

—The reports from the Free Methodist churches of the north-west are generally quite encouraging. Revivals are extending and strengthening the borders of many churches, though often through sore trial. Bro. Joseph Travis, who has supervision of the Iowa District this year experiences many of the difficulties of frontier life, akin to the "circuit-riders of the M. E. church in former days.

—The number of additions to the churches of the Disciples of Christ for the year past is estimated by the Christian Standard to be 30,254.

—At the communion season of the old North Reformed church, Fulton street, in New York on the first Sabbath in this month eighteen persons were received into the church, fifteen by profession and three by letter. So much for the down-town church that was to be sold.

—The British Bible Society employs two colporteurs in the Tyrol, who have been selling together from 500 to 700 Bibles per month. They met with much opposition from Catholics. It is now probable that one of them named Rauch, has been murdered in the southren part of the country.

—The Young Men's Christian Association of Madrid has established a school of colporteurs. It is intended for the preparation of men to act as Bible agents and assistants in the work of evangelization while pursuing their regular vocations.

—The Waldenses in Italy are doing a great work toward its evangelization. That church embraces three times as many missionary centers as it has churches. It has 40 mission stations extending from the foot of Mount Aetna to the Alps, 23 pastors, 15 evangelists, 50 teachers, 1,952 communicants, 58 day schools with 1,568 scholars, and 38 Sunday schools with 1,086 scholars.

—A Baptist chapel has been recently opened in Paris on the Rue de Lille. It was built for the French Baptist church by the American Baptist Missionary Union at a cost of $20,000.

—Nearly fourscore ministers in Dublin, belonging to the Irish Church, Presbyterians, Wesleyans, Primitives, Independents, Baptists and others have gratefully signed an acknowledgement of the good work done by Messrs. Sankey and Moody among their different churches.

—The Reformed Episcopalians are working for the establishment of a new church in the West Division of this city.

—Of all the outlays in these economical days, contraction should come last to the Lord's fund. And yet it must be otherwise practically for we find the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church is more than one hundred thousand dollars in debt; the Board of Foreign Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church report a considerable falling off in their income for 1874; the income of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions for the past six months has been only $19,914, a falling off for the same period last year of over $37,000.

—Rev. D. M. Ure, late pastor of the Second United Presbyterian church, Monmouth, Ill., and elected financial agent for Monmouth College at the last commencement, has succeeded in raising the endowment for which he set out.

—On account of the falling off in the missionary contributions this year, the American Missionary Association has been obliged to give up the plan of sending the Rev. E. M. Cravath to Africa to explore the territory near its mission. Unless more money is received, the Association will have to recall some of its missionaries now in the Southern States.

—At a meeting recently held in Manchester, England, in aid of the Church of England Mission to the East Coast of Africa, an important lettor was read from Sir Bartle Frere. It pointed out the fact that the Mission was opening a market for British manufacturers. Sir Bartle expressed his belief that if the slave trade were checked and Bishop Steere well supported, the growth of Christian communities of the Coast would soon make it of as great commercial importance as the coasts of India and Japan.

News of the Week.

The City.

Maj. Whittle and Prof. Bliss have been holding, during the past week, an interesting series of revival meetings in the First Congregational Church. Each evening the main floor of the large audience-room has been well filled with auditors. The Yokefellows distributed 20,000 printed invitations to meetings.——King Kalakaua spent the greater part of last week in Chicago, departing on Saturday morning for the Pacific coast. His impression of the city must not be supposed to rise higher than the themometer during the same time. Mayor Colvin acted toward him like a clown, and the Freemasons must needs show their profane ceremonies before him. ——Two murders have lately been committed in a locality of ill repute in the North Division.——It is estimated that the recommendations of Gen. Shaler for the increase of the Fire Department will cost $1,200,000, and there is little hope of using them.

Congress.

The President in approving the new finance bill which passed both houses very quietly amid the Southern commotion, makes some suggestions to the end that, it is a pledge of specie resumption in 1879, some further legislation should be made to make it effectual; also the necessity for increased revenue calls for a resumption of the tea and coffee tax.——He has also presented a message on Louisiana affairs, carefully reviewing the whole case, showing that Congress is responsible for the Kellogg government which he was compelled, from its inaction to recognize, though it is probably a gigantic fraud. He believes the action of the U. S. troops prevented a bloody outbreak on the 4th of January, and that Gen. Sheridan's plan would bring a speedy end to the disorder and ruin now prevailing.——Senator Logan has made a strong speech defending the administration in the recent transactions at the South.——The Louisiana Investigating Committee have sent in a report from their sub-committee detailing the recent events in New Orleans, and declaring the action of the present Returning Board to be fraudulent. The reports of intimidation, etc., get little credit from them. The whole committee has gone to New Orleans and will begin a thorough inquiry on Friday next.

The South.

The special committee appointed by the Kellogg Legislature to inquire into and report upon the recent extraordinary proceedings, have presented their report. They first show that a Republican member was kidnapped, and attempts made to kidnap others, while threats of assassination and violence were rife, being confirmed and indorsed by the Democratic press, in consequence of which Gov. Kellogg ordered Gen. Campbell, of the State Militia, to aid the police about the State building. They proceed to give an account of the conduct of Wiltz and fellow Democrats in organizing as they pleased and swearing in doubtful members; all this "violence and lawlessness" being in the face of the protests of the sitting Republicans. The ensuing scene was one of excitement, knives and revolvers being drawn, and bloodshed appearing imminent. Wiltz called for General De Trobriand, who arrived and restored peace, and was thanked by Wiltz for his interference. The Republican members then signed an application to the Governor asking that the legal members be put in possession of the hall. The previous organization, they said, was one of force and violence of law, and when the hall was cleared of all persons but those elected, they would proceed to organize properly. This was signed by fifty-two returned members, or half of the whole number. In compliance with this appeal the Governor applied to the military force of the United States to "assist his officers in expelling intruders and disturbers of the peace and preserving order, which assistance was rendered and order restored," Gen. De Trobriand acting this time on behalf of Kellogg. The Republican members were admitted and the five intruders expelled, this action being opposed by Wiltz and his Sergeant-at-Arms. The latter being unsuccessful in retaining possession of the hall, with all the Democrats retired, and the Republicans being left alone, proceeded to organize. Gen. Sheridan's report to the War department and the report of the Congressional committee agree substantially with the above.

Foreign.

A circular letter was received from Berlin a few days ago, which states that Germany, although assuming to respect the feelings of the Spanish Government, considers that she is obliged to satisfy public opinion and avenge the insult to her flag. She is disposed to adopt the same conciliatory policy toward the new Government which was sustained toward President Serrano; therefore, she claims from the goodwill of Spain the satisfaction due the German flag.——The Daily News (London) publishes a dispatch from Hendaye, Spain, stating that the German man-of-war Nautilus landed 100 men at Zarauz, on the Spanish coast, who occupied the place after a short resistance by the Carlists. Another dispatch states that Germany will soon have fifty guns on the northern coast of Spain.——Ultramontane journals are already complaining that it is not just that Alfonso should wear the crown which Don Carlos wrested from the hands of "infidels," and recommending that the question of the claims of Alfonso and Don Carlos to the crown should be left to the decision of the Pope.

Home and Health Hints.

HOME ADORNMENT.—In village and rural district one sees a variety of vessels brought into use for growing plants, such as cheese-boxes, dinner-pots, stove-urns, wash-basins, dish-pans, broken kettles, bread-trays, sap-troughs, buckets, paint-kegs, peach-baskets, in fact nearly everything that will hold soil, from a pint basin to a caldron. Some of these are well filled and made beautiful, and some are abominable. A home-made vase, a wooden bowl covered with rough knots and properly mounted, with luxuriant foliage drooping from the sides and plants bright and graceful growing therein, fully eclipses a pretentious iron vace with unhealthy, languishing exotics. Almost any vessel covered with delicate trailers answers a purpose of ornamentation we may have in view; but many of the efforts referred to are wholly unsuccessful, if not repugnant, for there is no sense of fitness or harmony, no proportion between the vessel and the pedestal, no handsome vines and flowers to fix the attention, but there swings the old, naked wash-basin from spring to autumn, and perhaps all winter, filled with hard earth and a few pinks and Johnny-jump-ups; and there, on the stump of a sapling, sits the old rusty dish-pan containing some defunct specimen of the vegetable order. People who own these have no natural aptitude for making things beautiful, and no concern for their offense against good taste, which every member of the community ought to possess. Cultivation does much for all our faculties, yet it can never make a musician out of one who has neither time nor tune, so I doubt whether one who has no innate sense of fitness, of material refinement, and good effect can ever be so educated as to make anything really meritorious in the way of ornament. We need not undervalue our gifts because the æsthetic has no place in our nature. In some of the industries of the North we may do excellent, all-important work. Doubtless this incipient period of door-yard adornment will lead, in many cases, to an improved taste; if the fathers hang on their walls poor lithographs, the children may get fine chromos, and the grandchildren paintings of unquestioned merit. Hence, while a genuine striving after beauty, however furtile now, may express itself appropriately in the future; those who have no such aspirations, but are simply following, afar off, a custom or fashion might better strive.—N. Y. Tribune.

CURE FOR FROSTED FEET.—A writer in the New York Journal of Commerce, says the following is a simple but effectual remedy for curing frosted feet, and that it will afford immediate relief:

Heat a brick very hot, and hold the foot as closely as it can be held without burning. Cut an onion in two, and dipping it repeatedly in salt, rub it all over the foot. The juice of the onion will be dried into the foot, and effect a cure in a very short time. If this is done for a few times, it is almost certain to cure your feet entirely.

Farm and Garden.

BLOODY MILK is caused from exudation of blood into the lactiferous tubes, and there it becomes mixed with the milk. It arises from congestion, —over-distention of the blood-vessels (perhaps rupture of some of the capillaries.) Mammittis (inflammation or congestion of the udder)- very frequently occurs in cows at the time of parturition—when it cannot be traced to this cause, among the most common are external injuries, cold, etc., etc. The treatment must be according to the present symptoms—if inflammation exists, which may be known by tenderness, fullness, redness, and heat, use hot fomentations, poultices, etc., and give internally epsom salts, 3 oz.; Jamaica ginger, 4 drs.; hot water, 8 oz. every six hours until the bowels are freely evacuated. After the inflammation has decreased use the following liniment compound: Tincture soap, 12 oz.; belladonna tincture, 4 oz.; mix.—N. Y. Tribune.

—"A good horse," says Julian Berners in a tract on hunting printed by Wynkyn de Worde in 1496, "sholde have fifteen good propryties and condycions; that is, to wyte, three of a man, three of a woman, three of a foxe, three of a haare, and three of an asse. Of a man, boled, prowde and hardye; of a woman, fayre breasted, fayre of heere, and easy to move; of a foxe, a fayre tayll, short eeres, with a good trotte; of a haare, a grete eye, a dry heede, and well rennying; of an asse, a biggye chynn, flat legge, and a good hoof."

HOG CHOLERA.—A Sangamon, Illinois, correspondent recommends the following as having been successful in his neighborhood: Take poke root and boil it and mix it with slops or other food and give it to the hogs in pretty liberal quantities. It is well to boil some of it and have it handy to use at any time. Authorities have indorsed the same thing. The poke root may be fed in small quantities cut up with corn or other food.

Temperance.

—Bangor has a temperance revival that amounts to something. Nearly two hundred persons accustomed to use intoxicating liquor, have signed the pledge, some of them rumsellers.

—Mr. Alfred Cope has offered $25,000 to the Philadelphia Zoological Society on condition that all malt, vinous, or spirituous liquors shall be forever excluded from the premises, and that all questionable or illegitimate exhibitions shall be prohibited. The Trustees accepted the generous gift by an almost unanimous vote.

—Father Hanley, Catholic priest at Dwight, Ill., preached a powerful sermon, recently, and drew a striking contrast between the Catholic saloon-keeper and the infidel saloon-keeper, the former believing in a God and a future state of rewards and punishments, while the latter denies the existance of a God, and takes as his maxim, "Eat, drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die." Hence, every time the Catholic saloon-keeper filled the glass of his neighbor, he was appealed to by his conscience, his faith, and his Redeemer, not to be the cause of another man's sins.

Talmage's Last Cigar.

After giving his experience with his first cigar in boyhood, Mr. Talmage speaks thus of his deliverance from the vile habit.

But how about my last cigar? It was three o'clock Sabbath morning in my Western home. I had smoked three or four cigars since tea. At that time I wrote my sermons and took another cigar with each new head of discourse. I thought I was getting the inspiration from above, but was getting much of it from beneath. My hand trembled along the line, and strung up to the last tension of nerves, I finished my work and started from the room. A book standing on the table fell over, and although it was not a large book, its fall sounded to my excited system like a crack of a pistol. As I went down stairs their creaking made my hair stand on end. As I flung myself on a sleepless pillow I resolved, God helping, that I had smoked my last cigar, and committed my last sin of night-study. I kept my promise. With the same resolution went overboard tea and coffee. That night I was born into a new physical, mental, and moral life. Perhaps it may be better for some to smoke, and study nights, and take exciting temperance beverages; but I am persuaded that if thousands of people who now go moping, and nervous, and half exhausted through life, down with "sick headaches," and rasped by irritabilities, would try a good dose of abstinence, they would thank God for this paragraph of personal experience, and make the world the same bright place I find it, a place as attractive that nothing short of heaven would be good enough to exchange for it. The first cigar made me desperately sick: the throwing away of my last made me gloriously well. For me the croaking of the midnight owl has ceased, and the time of the singing of the birds has come.

MASONRY A WORK OF DARKNESS.

A SERMON BY

REV. LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG.

Another speeimen of the perversion of the Bible, is the Farce in the Royal Arch Degree, of the taking of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, the carrying away of the Jews into the caytivity of Babylon, and their return to Jerusalem.

In receiving the Royal Areh Degree, three eandidates are hood-winked, and bound together with a strong rope round the body, at the distance of about four feet apart. Thus prepared, a most tremendous "hue and ery" is raised by the fraternity, "The Chaldeans are upon us." Cannon balls, or other round substanees, are rolled over the floor of the Chapter-room, to represent the rumbling sound of the pretended chariot wheels of the enemy. Horror fills the room. The sounding of horns, the rattling of bells, imitations of martial musie, the elashing of arms, the diseharge of pistols, aeeompanied by the most hideous cries, "The Chaldeans are upon us," are designed to fill the eandidates with terror, while they are dragged head-long to Babylon: that is, huddled into a small adjoining room. Here they eontinuc in a state of captivity SEVENTY YEARS: that is, perhaps five or ten minutes at the expiration of whieh, their liberty is proclaimed by the ediet of Cyrus the Persian, and a proposal is made for volunteers to return and build up the waste places of Jerusalem. The eandidates volunteer under the direetion of a Masonic offieer, styled "Prineipal Sojourner," representing an old experienced Jew, and thus, in the farce, a mareh is set out from Babylon to Jerusalem. A rugged road is now to be traveled—ropes are stretehed aeross their path, and stumbling-blocks, benches, billets of wood, and a variety of obstructions are put in the way of the blind eandidates bound together. A row of Masons are stationed on each side of their path, with hands joined to form the arch under which they are to pass, and a team of Masons are forward tugging at the rope, suffieiently strong to drag them headlong, whieh is often done, when all the candidates have stumbled, and are prostrate on the floor.

Arriving at Jerusalem, the several vails of the temple are to be passed, at eaeh of whieh they meet with opposition, and are pretendedly suspected of being spies and enemies, until the Principal Sojourner evinees the eontrary, by an imitation of the signs and tokens whieh Moses wrought before Pharaoh, to prove his Divine mission. In this part of the farce, a crooked staff with the head in the form of a serpent, is thrown upon the floor, and appears like a serpent; is taken again in the hand and proves only to be a erooked staff. The hand thrust into the bosom, and taken out pretendedly leprous, and thrust into the bosom again, and taken out fair; an imitation of water thrown upon the land, and beeoming blood; and other like imitations of the signs and tokens of the aneient Prophet of God, prove at length, satisfaetorily to the Masters of the respective vails, and offieers of the Masonic temple, that the eandidates are true men; and they are admitted as Masonie laborers in repairing the desolations of Jerusalem and the Temple.

All these imitations of Seripture facts, exhibited in a Masonic faree, together with the imitation of the vision of the burning bush, in whieh Jehovah is personified by a Masonie offieer in the Chapter-room; the professed discovery of the ark of the covenant among the rubbish, containing a key of an alphabet to understand a mystieal language, by whieh the long-lost Master's Word is found to be God, profeSsedly expressed in three different languages, forming the Royal Arch Word is JAH-BUH-LUN; together with the fooleries of raising a living arch by three times three, in the name of God, and in a manner highly profane and impious, all which are palmed on Masonic candidates as traditions of the Order, founded on the authority of Divine revelation, can be viewed in no other light, if truth is our guide, than a shameless and wicked perversion of the Holy Scriptures, and adds to the list of testimony to prove that Freemasonry is a Work of Darkness.

In the Mark Master's Degree, the representation of a stone in the form of a key-stone of an arch, adorned with a mystic circular inscription of the initials, "H. T. W. S. S. T. K. S.," is presented by the candidate to Masonic inspectors, as a specimen of workmanship, and on account of its irregular form, is condemned as useless, and cast among the rubbish. Masonic tradition states, that such was the fact in condemning and casting away a refuse stone, at the building of King Solomon's temple. In the Royal Arch degree, the eandidates are represented as finding this long condemned stone among the rubbish, and are Masonically instructed to understand that it was to this very stone the Psalmist and Apostle had reference when the former evidently predicted the humiliation and exaltation of the Messiah to eome; and the latter applied that prediction as having been fulfilled in the suffering, death, and triumphant resurrection of the Lord Jesus. Here is a bold speeimen of the manner in which the name of Jesus is explained away by Masonic theorists. Jesus, the Lamb of God, onee despised, rejected and slain by the pretended Jewish builders of the Church of God—Jesus, who humbled himself unto death, and was exalted to be a Prince and a Saviour, the head of the corner, the Foundation of the Church of God, the name which angels adore, and which is preeious to all the saints on earth and in heaven, finds no plaee in the Masonic temple. The institution of Freemasonry acknowledges no human depravity which needs a Saviour's atonement, and records neither the sufferings nor the triumphant glories of the Saviour of men. Like the inn of Bethlehem, whieh afforded no room nor aeeommodation for his birth, Masonry prefers the key-stone of an arch, professedly wrought in the forest of Lebanon, and inscribed with Masonic initials, signifying, "Hiram, Tyrian, Widow's Son, Sent To King Solomon." Yes, readers, such a Masonie key-stone is the Masonic amount of the import of those impressive passages of Holy Writ, which declare that Jesus Christ, the Great Redeemer, is the stone whieh the Jewish builders rejected, and that Jesus Christ is the foundation and chief corner stone of the Church of God. "The stone," said the pious Psalmist, in a prophetie strain, "whieh the builders refused, is beeome the head-stone of the corner." And, "This is the stone," said the holy Apostle, addressing the unbelieving Jews, and applying the foregoing prediction to the crucified and risen Savior, "This is the stone whieh was set at nought of YOU builders, whieh is become the head of the corner. Neither is there salvation in any other; for there is none other name under heaven, given among men, whereby we must be saved." To apply sueh passages ts the keystone of a Masonic temple, is a perversion of Seripture, which affords great weight of evidenee that the institution of Freemasonry belongs to the Works of Darkness.

II. BECAUSE IT MAKES PROVISION FOR THE COMMISSION AND CONCEALMENT OF CAPITAL AND OTHER CRIMES.

The provision alluded to, is comprised in Masonic obligations. By the obligations of Masonry, we are to understand the oaths and penalties whieh eandidates for Masonic degrees are required to take upon themselves, on receiving each and every Degree of Masonry, by repeating the words after the Master, always concluding with "So help me God, make me steadfast and faithful o perform the same. A violation of the least point of Masonic obligation, subjeets the perpetrator to the penalty of a barbarous death. This is evident from the express words of Masonic obligations, eaeh of which closes with a penalty, of whieh the following is a specimen:

"Binding myself under no less penalty, than to have my throat cut, my tongue torn out by the roots: my left breast torn open, and my heart and vitals taken from thenee: my body sevcred in the midst, divided to the north and south, and my bowels burnt to ashes in the eenter: my skull smote off."

Such are some of the penalties of Masonic obligations, under whieh every Mason swears that he will never reveal any part or parts, point, or points, of the secrets of Freemasonry. The following words are found in Masonic obligations generally:

"Binding myself under no less penalty, etc., if I should ever be guilty of so great a erime as to violate ANY PART of this my solemn oath and obligation."

This proves that a Mason forfeits his life by the least deviation from the Masonie oath. A disclosure of the Masonic secret that the name of the grip of the Entered Apprentiee Degree, is "BOAZ;" or a diselosure of the seeret that the pass-word of the next Degree is "SHIBBOLETH," or the name of the grip "JACHIN;" or that the pass-word from thence to the Master's Degree is "TUBAL-CAIN," and the Master's word is "MAH-HAH-BONE;" yes, readers the disclosure of a single point of the foregoing nonsensical secrets, would be a crime, in Masonic estimation, worthy of death. If a Mason wrong a brother Mason out of two-pence, or forget to pray for every other brother Mason when on his knees, or fail to attend a summoned meeting of the Lodge, when it is in his power to attend, he violates his Masonic obligation, and commits a crime worthy of death by Masonie law. That such is the nature of Masonic obligations is evident from the united testimony of Seceding Masons.

Two points are now carefully to be examined. First, to consider whether there is any proof before the public that the penalty of death has ever, in any case, been inflicted by Masons, on violators of Masonic obligations. And secondly, to consider whether sueh execution of Masonic penalties is justifiable by the laws of civiliza tion, or whether it is to be considered a crime of murder.

The first of these points we affirm, and declare that there is proof before the public, that the penalty of death has been inflicted by Masons on violators of Masonic obligations. William Morgan, a Mason, wrote a book entitled "ILLUSTRATIONS OF MASONRY, whieh is proved to be a true and faithful revelation of the seerets of that institution, in its first three Degrees. For this Masonic offence, he was taken by Masons, and forcibly transported from Batavia to Canandaigua, and from thence to Fort Niagara, in the State of New York. That he is dead, is evident from two existing facts. One is, that it is years since his abduction by Masons, and to this day, no one of the fraternity is found to give any aeeount wherc he is, which they most assuredly would do if he were alive, to save their institution from public impeachment.

Another circumstanee that evinces the death of William Morgan is, that the body of a dead man was found on the beach of Lake Ontario, at Oak Orehard Creek, nearly a year after Morgan's abduetion; and on the examination of a coroner's inquest, in presence of hundreds of spectators, it was found to possess partieular marks, which were previously sworn, by the widow and other creditable witnesses, to have been on the body of William Morgan in his life time. Mueh exeitement existing at the ime, to prevent all suspicions of imposture, a number oft depositions were taken in writing, subscribed and sworn to before the dead body had been seen by the deponents. In these depositions the following marks were identified for substance thus: that on the great toe of the left foot of William Morgan, was a lump of considerable size and hard substance, oeeasioned by a sore some years previous. Another mark particularized in the deposition was, that the teeth of William Morgan were all double, that two of his teeth were missing, designating the jaws from which they had been extraeted: and that the tooth adjoining the vaeuity, on one side, was in part split off. On examination these very marks were found on that dead body, answering in all respects, the deseription previously given of them by the witnesses. Mrs. Morgan, the afflicted widow, in presenee of a numerous assembly, presented the identieal teeth of her husband, which had been extracted from his jaws years before and which she had carefully preserved. The same physician who had extracted them from the jaws of William Morgan in his life time, took the teeth from the hand of Mrs. Morgan, and applying them to the jaw of the dead body, found them to fit, and to fill the vacuity exactly, forming a eomplete set of double teeth round, except the one split off. Other marks specified in the depositions were also satisfactorily found to exist on the dead body; such as long white hairs in the ears, extreme hairiness of the body, with the height and apparent age.

Objections arising from th improbability that a body would continue in sueh a state of perfeet preservation so long time in water, were answered by the physicians then present, who united in testimony that human bodies under water, and not exposed to air, might be preserved during such period in as good, if not better, state than the corpse before them. And although Mrs. Morgan aeknowledged that the clothing on the dead body was not such as her husband had on when he went from home, yet she hesitated not to deelare under oath, that she verily believed that corpse to be the dead body of William Morgan, her husband; and so said all, or nearly all the witnesses then present. The whole assembly examined for themselves, the result of whieh was a general eonviction that the object of examination was the dead body of William Morgan. Sueh, also, was the verdiet of the jury of inquest, which was reeorded and published under the signature of the eoroner, and with all the names of the jurors inserted.

From such testimony we hesitate not to affirm, that William Morgan's dead body was providentially diseovered on the shore of Lake Ontario, and was laid to rest in the grave. But who put him to death? is the question. It is aeknowledged that positive testimony has not been legally adduced sufficient to eonvict any person or persons of taking his life, in a manner which would justify the execution of the penalty of the civil law against them. Years have passed by; vigilant efforts have been made: much money has been expended; but this point has not been gained. The testimony to prove, identically, the circumstances of his last struggies, such as the time when, the place where, the manner how, and the person or persons by whom William Morgan was put to death, together with all who were accessory to his death, depends entirely on Masons. They are bound by oath paramount, in their estimation, to that of the civil law, to keep the whole matter a secret forever. Hence, when called upon to testify on the case, they have declared that they knew nothing about it, or they have obstinately refused to give testimony, and suffered the penalty of two hundred and fifty dollars fine, and from one to three months imprisonment, rather than testify to the truth and expose the enormity of Masonry, as was the well known case of Orasmus Turner, Eli Bruce and John Whitney, in the late trials at the West. But why would not these men testify on a case, the circumstances of which they well knew? Let Orasmus Turner answer for them all.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samnel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issned by him, purporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this conntry, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationa ist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—'The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abdnction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The anthor belonged to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughont the conntry forty years ago. The hook contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is snpposed hy many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acqnainted with Mr. Greene. and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y., and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—' The Storm Gathering;" "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

Enlarging the Subscription List.

Some of our readers are doing al- they ought in endeavoring to enlarge our subscription list. Others are intending to. Some have done much in the past and are taking a rest. The number of life subscribers seems to be steadily increasing.

To aid those who wish to help circulate the Cynosure we are now sending to our subscribers packages of the Cynosure prospectus. Will those who receive them be so kind as to distribute them? Many living near you may not know that there is such a paper as the Cynosure published. Perhaps you are too aged or infirm to do so. Please excuse us for sending to you if such is the case. We seldom forget our friends on the mail list, but sometimes forget or do not know that they are feeble. If you cannot distribute these copies of the prospectus yourself, perhaps you can find a friend who will, or perhaps your post-master will put them in the boxes at the post office rather than have them lost. Use them if you can, but remember that we do not wish to impose on your good nature. We have no doubt but that if all who can work for the Cynosure do so the mail list will be doubled during the year.

The petitions which are to be sent in on or before the first of February are beginning to arrive. Robert Berry, Carbondale, Pa., aged almost seventy-six years, sends in 228 names. He spent ten or twelve days in collecting them. Those who have not yet had their petitions filled out are requested to be as expeditious as possible during the few days that remain in January.

THE FOLLOWING ARE THE NAMES RECEIVED FOR THE REGIMENT thus far: A. B. Copeland, O. C. Stoughton, Increase Leadbetter, S. G. Barton, C. M. Livesay, *Alex. Wisely, H. H. Hinman, J. T. W. Logan, Wm. Sherman, Thos. Mayne, Mrs. Mary A. Gamble, B. J. Hunt, Philip Bacon, *James Powars, W. Edgerton, J. A. Brown, L. H. Pierson, J. S. Hickman, *Wm. Worth, *Wm. Hallowell, John T. Parker. These with the additional names of Moses Pettingill, *Ira Green, Geo. W. Clarke, John Gamble, Jr., Lewis Axtel and Chas. Mundhenk, comprise the company of one hundred proposed by Mr. Clarke. Who comes next? Shall not the ranks be full?

*Already filled pledge.

Postage on the Cynosure.

THE POSTAGE ON THE CYNOSURE MUST BE PAID AT CHICAGO. It is twenty cents a year.

The cost of postage now depends entirely on the size and weight, and therefore some smaller papers charge but fifteen cents; and others about the size of the Cynosure charge twenty-five cents a year for postage.

If the subscription price of the CYNOSURE was $2.50 or $3.00 a year, the price of many religious papers containing no more reading matter, we might afford to pay the postage ourselves, but at $2.00 a year we cannot do this with our present Subscription list.

Therefore let all send the postage, 20 cents a year, 10 cents for half a year with their renewals.

The commission on one new subscription for a year will pay the postage on your own and the new subscriber's paper. We would rather have the postage paid by commissions than in any other way.

When postage is not paid we shall have to shorten the time of subscription sufficiently to pay it.

The American Newspaper Directory is an epitome of newspaper history. It is also regarded as an official register of circulations. This feature, requires the closest scrutiny to prevent it from leading to abuses. The plan, adopted by the publishers of the Directory, to secure correct and trustworthy reports, is rigid in its requirements and adhered to with impartiality. Successful publishers, who have something to gain by a comparison, are generally prompt, not only to send reports in conformity but give Messrs. George P. Rowell & Co. such information as enables them to weed out unsubstantiated statements of pretenders in journalism. The popularity of the book, and the general confidence in the accuracy and good faith are attested by the immense body of advertisements it receives.

—The three largest dry-goods jobbing houses in the country last year were, in order, H. B. Claflin & Co., A. T. Stewart & Co., New York, and Field, Leiter & Co., Chicago. The race between the two latter was close, but probably the Chicago house has the second place this season. Their jobbing business for the year ending Dec. 31, was 19,700,000.

Topics of the Time.

"N. P. D," three unfortunate initials in Masonic cabalism, promise to be as pragmatical with the farmer's order as they have been and are increasingly with the original. For instance: In the wealthy States of Illinois and Iowa, the State Granges lately held report, respectively, four hundred and thirty-three and one thousand one hundred subordinate granges in arrears for dues. This evidence of secret weakness ought to be gratifying to the whole agricultural community. It shows a sensible economy deserving of encouragement.

Governor Beveridge believes in the precept, Politicians help one another. The Congressional Representative from the First Illinois District lately died. His term would have expired in a few weeks with the session of Congress, and a successor was some time ago chosen. But there were a few weeks of the unexpired term remaining, and the Governor remembered that in the stringency of the times there must be some poor politician in need of bread for his family. How better assist him than by giving him a little job? So an election is ordered for the unexpired term of six weeks. That gives time to go to Washington and spend a little time in luxurious idleness for the trifle of $1,200, which sum the "dear people" will gladly spend to add one vote to a majority which does not need it, or to a minority it cannot help. The Governor's act was also benevolent to politicians of obscure record or evil fame, who are resented by conventions of the people. They could nominate themselves, get a few votes, and forever enjoy the blissful memory of the time when they "ran for Congress." To the parties who foot the election bills and the salary of a needless Representative, however it's a song in minor key.

The withdrawal of Mr. Gladstone from the political arena altogether seems probable since his resignation of the leadership of the Liberal party of Great Britain. This position he has held with great ability for years, and the party has yielded to his views so entirely, that he will not wish to embarrass the new leader by retaining a nominal connection with it. His great genius can be turned to pursuits, which, if less active, are scarcely less influential in shaping the opinions of his fellow countrymen on questions of great public importance. His pamphlet on the papal usurpation has agitated the religious and political world as no other publication for years. Over one hundred thousand copies have been issued and the sales continue at the rate of several thousand daily. The replies of the Catholic leaders are full proof of its power. It has brought into clear light before the world the two parties existing among the Romanists of England and the strength of their union with Rome. It has removed all doubt on the position of the Liberal Catholics, who own themselves "Englishmen first, Catholics after," while the great majority follow Archbishop Manning and Capel, a leading spirit in the new Catholic University at Kensington. The propositions of the latter, says the London Times, "amount to this—that the Pope's power is superior to that of Queen Victoria and defines the limit within which she may be obeyed; and that if the Legislature passes the province which the Pope defines as 'proper' for it, he has the right to condemn it, and, consequently, to exact from all Roman Catholics obedience to himself and disobedience to the law." This is the Higher Law of Rome.

Will we ever know the truth of the Louisiana troubles? The report of the sub-committee presented last week to Congress throws no light on the question. This report is drawn up by three gentlemen; one a Republican, one a Democrat, and the third a Republican, but probably of the New York Tribune class (he is closely connected with that journal). But their political bias has nothing to do with the facts they were sent for. Otherwise they are dishonest men. They found in Louisiana no intimidation of voters or persecution of negroes in connection with politics. They found the Returning Board guilty of attempting gross fraud to retain the Republicans in power. They found the White Leagues of the State simple political clubs, neither armed nor secret. In New Orleans it is only an organization of various clubs, which own arms as private citizens. The terrors of the White League, from their showing, vanish. On the other hand there are evidences that the committee have not fairly represented the case in some particulars. The Congressional Committee at Vicksburg find there a White League; find intimidation; and such a state of affairs that the blacks cannot in their opinion be protected without a large force. It is notorious that thousands of black men and their white friends have been murdered. In every difficulty they, not the Democrats, have been the sufferers. Individual Republicans of Louisiana, whose word is unimpeached, state that their party had no opportunity of testifying either fully or fairly. But the White Leagues of New Orleans had full liberty in the examination and their testimony is embodied in the report, notwithstanding its partisan character. The granges of Louisiana have endorsed the report and recommend it to Congress. The full committee itself consider the report an unfair one and has adjourned to New Orleans for an examiuation whi h will leave no feature of the case unexhausted.

Charles Sumner.

BY H. W. LONGFELLOW.

Garlands upon his grave,
And flowers upon his hearse
And to the tender heart and brave
The tribute of this verse.

His was the tronbled life,
The conflict and the pain,
The grief, the bitterness of strife,
The honor without stain.

Like Winkelried, he took Into his manly breast
The sheaf of hostile spears, and broke
A path for the oppressed;

Then from the fatal field
Upon a nation's heart
Borne like a warrior on his shield!—
So should the brave depart.

Death takes us by surprise,
And stays our hurrying feet;
The great design unfinished lies,
Our lives are incomplete.

But in the dark unknown
Perfect their circles seem,
Even as a bridge's arch of stone
Is rounded in the stream.

Alike are life and death,
When life and death survives,
And the uninterrupted breath
Inspires a thousand lives.

Were a star quenched on high,
For ages would its light,
Still traveling downward from the sky,
Shine on our mortal sight.

So when a great man dies,
For years beyond our kin,
The light he leaves behind him lies
Upon the paths of men.

The United Presbyterian Philadelphia Presbytery and Odd-Fellowship.

MR. EDITOR:—Yesterday, Jan. 12, 1875, was a field day in the above Presbytery in connection with the admission of Odd-fellows to church membership in the congregation of the United Presbyterian church here. And since the National Association for abolishing secret societies is pledged to endeavor to reform those churches that commit spiritual fornication with such societies, I set me down to furnish you a report of yesterday's case in the professedly anti-secret society church above named. I need not say to you or your readers, that without exposure to public knowledge, and to a healthy public religious sentiment, the churches will never be reformed and purged from their complicity with the iniquities of secret societies. And in regard to those churches, which profess to be anti-secret society churches, but which, in works, do more or less deny and falsify the good profession contained in their church "testimonies" and ecclesiastical acts, I apprehend that publicity is the only proper means of reforming them also. Their security, hitherto, from exposure has rested mainly in the connivance of their local presbyteries and in the silence of their church papers respecting these tender points; but when they find that their mal-administrations are sure to be exposed to their brethren and the world by an independent press, there is good hope that an era of true reformation will ensue.

The first ball in such a desirable reformation was set rolling yesterday in the above presbytery, and when, (through your independent paper and other channels) its reverberations shall sound throughout the United Presbyterian churches in the West, we believe it will give a force and volume to the already rising wave of reformation in the Western churches of the above-named denomination, which will sweep all before it.

The case came up before the presbytery in the form of an appeal by two of the elders of the session of the North United Presbyterian congregation of Philadelphia (Rev. Joseph Kerr, pastor), being the minority of that session against a decision and act of the majority admitting a person of the of the name of Stewart to church membership, who is a member of an Odd-fellow's lodge, and who, after being dealt with by a committee of the session, refused to renounce his connection with the Odd-fellows; declaring that he could see nothing wrong in that connection, but would keep his mind open to conviction, and when convinced that it was wrong, would renounce it. On this basis he was received into the fellowship of that congregation of an anti-secret society church. The session was divided on the vote, two elders against, two for, (one elder absent), and the pastor, Mr. Kerr, decided the matter by his casting vote to admit the person to their church-fellowship, and, of course, to the fellowship of the whole United Presbyterian church. The two elders who voted against his admission, (I wish here to blazon their names, that "honor to whom honor is due," may be awarded to them wherever this tale is read and told), and who appealed the case to the presbytery, were Robert E. Elliot and John Spratt. To their praise, let me add, that no consideration of personal friendship nor interest, were able to make these true, faithful brethren flinch from their appeal, and on yesterday they conducted their cause with an ability, zeal, and straightforward honesty, which greatly redounds to their credit.

Since the facts of the case were correctly stated by both parties, and both parties were agreed to these, the above-named two brethren as appellants, and Rev. Mr. Kerr, the pastor, and James McCandless, elder, appellees, who represented the majority of the session, the main interest of the trial centered in the speeches made by the judges, or members of the court, both the ministers and elders. It was indeed a day of purgatory to most of the ministers and elders. Though they were the judges, it was evident from their speeches, that the real position which many of them sustained, was that of criminals at the bar of the public opinion of the members of the U. P. church in particular, and of Christians in general. All of them disavowed being Freemasons or Odd-fellows and all expressed their decided opposition to secret societies. So far, well. Yet when it came to the votes, "Sustain, or not sustain," this appeal from an act of the session of one of the churches under their jurisdiction, which had admitted an Odd-fellow to membership, six of these ministers and four of these elders voted to not sustain the appeal, while five ministers and five elders voted to sustain it; ten against ten—a tie vote. The moderator, it would seem, had no casting vote, (he had voted as a minister previously.) So the result was answered that the appeal was not sustained. The appellants protested and appealed to the next meeting of the synod, which will not be till some nine months hence, and so this Odd-fellow remains in the membership of the United Presbyterian church till then at least, and another "O. F." is thus added to the number of Freemasons and Odd-fellows who are now enjoying the privilege of full Christian fellowship in probably six or seven of the United Presbyterian congregations of Philadelphia.

THE VOTE.

When the moderator came to put the question, sustain or not sustain the appeal, on the motion of Dr. W. W. Barr, the vote was ordered to be taken by the yeas and nays, and so the roll was called. First, the names of the ministers and then of the elders. This enables me to record the vote as follows, which will, I believe, be found correct: Voted to sustain the appeal: Ministers, Barr, Fitzgerald, Crowe, White, and Stevenson. Elders, Shilton, Smith, Samuel Cochran, J. C. Kerr, and Patrick. Voted not to sustain the appeal: Ministers, Church, Dales, Wilson, Jackson, Campbell, and Whitten. Elders, Getty, Taylor, Anderson, and Patton.

It should here be stated that several of the ministers who had made brave speeches declaring their opposition to secret societies, and even acknowledging that the law of the U. P. church was express against the admission of Freemasons and Odd-fellows to membership in their congregations, wished, in voting, to be allowed to explain the reasons of their votes not to sustain this appeal, as well they might, for to outsiders 'twas as hard to see the consistency of their speeches with their votes, as to see through a three-inch door. But this was ruled out of order; and besides, they had already in their speeches had ample opportunity to do so; whether to their own entire conviction and satisfaction, they best know.

It would be improper to close this report without noting that Rev. W. W. Barr (minister), took the lead on this interesting occasion, in maintaining the cause of truth and purity in the communion to which he belongs; and he displayed much intrepidity, ability, and zeal. He was followed and most effectually supported by Rev. Messrs. Cowe, Stevenson (a returned missionary to India), and the other ministers on that side. Nor would it be proper to omit pointed reference to the elders on that side, some of whom made speeches quite up to the standard of the ministry; and indeed the elders on both sides made speeches most creditable to their position.

Lapse of time and space forbid me from even an attempt to sketch the speeches of the members of the court. Suffice it to say that the many admissions made by them, proved to the most ignorant, that Freemasons, Odd-fellows, etc., were shielded in many of the congregations of this presbytery, from the discipline of the U. P. church One elder, Mr. Getty, who deprecated the bringing of this case, warned the other side, that "it would be a firebrand both in this presbytery, and throughout the United Presbyterian church," and declared that we were standing on a volcano. Although everything might seem flourishing and prosperous, like the green foliage on Vesuvius, yet if we did not take great care to quench this first spark, an explosion would certainly ensue, and no one could tell how and where it would end!" And many other such solemn warnings did Elder Getty paint and picture forth most terrible to mortal ears. Yet his opponents seemed perfectly imperturbed and unmoved by the appeals; and some of them even had the insolence and skill to draw from them damnable proofs from their opponent's own admissions, that some, at least, of the U. P. Philadelphia churches greatly needed an anti-secret river of purgation to be let in upon them!

This, Mr. Editor, is the first flood of the reforming tide in the Philadelphia U. P. churches. May that tide continue to rise and flow on, till it "over flows all the hiding places for Freemasons and Odd-fellows, etc., within the communion of the United Presbyterian church, and till that branch of the church (and some others which might be named), shall become not only anti-secret churches on paper, but "in deed and in truth!" And may the wave of reform rise still higher and higher, till all the churches shall follow suit, and till all such foul birds of the kingdom of darkness shall be cast out of them, to roost only in the dark and secret haunts where they belong, and find no lodgment on the branches and under the fair and beauteous foliage of the church of God. A. F. A. M.

BY D. B. TURNEY, PRESIDENT OF THE WABASH VALLEY DISTRICT ASSOCIATION OF THE METHODIST CHURCH.

The mystic and cabalistic letters, A. F. A. M., denote Ancient Free and Accepted Mason. Well, I'm not one. I have not been hoodwinked, cable-towed, swindled and mystic-tied. But I claim a right to express my opinion. I belong to no clan, and will never advocate a measure that is not amenable to open investigation and discussion.

I have been told that many good men uphold and countenance Freemasonry. I do not doubt the fact. Many good men believed slavery a divine institution. A man may be a good man without possessing a faultless estimation of right and wrong. My father is a Mason, and my grandfather is a Mason. They are both good men: but then, in my judgment, they are hoodwinked and need light.

1. Religiously, I cannot join. Even open infidels, like Dr. Curl, of Paris, when they die are represented as translated from the lodge below to the celestial lodge above. If that be not the meanest form of Universalism, what is it? I never will be found courting the applause and toadying for the patronage of such an organization. "Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his." The immoral feature that crops out in the A. F. A. M. ritual of burial, sending every departed brother of the mystic tie, without regard to his moral fitness and character, to enjoy the degrees and favors of the celestial lodge, prompts me as an honest and sincere believer in the truth of Matt. xxv. 46, to permanently refrain from sending in my name. Until I become a zealous Universalist, I cannot consistently take a nocturnal tramp to the east in search of light. If I feel in need of light, I shall seek it according to the method recommended in James i. 5.

2. Economically, I cannot join. Who can fail to see the unjustifiable and profligate expenditures for frivolus trappings and foolishness? I need to aid educational and literary institutions, and it will not do to lavish my money on such an organization. Pray, when did Freemasonry ever build a college, or a hospital, or an institution for any of the unfortunate of earth? How far does Masonic benevolence extend? At this point I could, if I would, unfold a tale. Lodge claims of superior excellence, I am very well convinced are false claims.

3. Politically, I cannot join. Do I not know that it is essential and peculiar to free republican government, to invite criticism and inspection? How much argument does it need to prove that the existence of any organization in this country with secret and concealed measures, objects and principles, is hostile to the spirit and contrary to the very nature of our national government? As I do not desire to witness the overthrow of republican government, I cannot consistently patronize the lodge. How can I? How can anybody?

4. Ministerially, I cannot join. Who can point to the conversion of any soul from sin and Satan to God and holiness by means of such alliance? While the lodge has frequently kept members from attending public religious services, and has often interfered with prayer and class-meeting, I never have known a soul to have been made more spiritual by belonging. I am afraid I have known some to decrease in spirituality from this very cause; and I find that it pains and wounds the cause of Christ. Did Christ teach and encourage ostentation, fondness for titles and self-exalting pride? I have known the lodge try to dictate to the pulpit.

5. Honestly, I cannot join. Can an honest man patronize a falsehood knowing it to be such? Can an honest man patronize an institution of which the ancient landmarks are fraud, rapine, and murder? If I honestly profess to follow Him who in secret said nothing, I would impeach my honesty or my intelligence, perhaps both, by joining. I do not oppose Freemasonry on the ground of its secrecy. Against the secret feature of that order, I make very little objection; for I can see no impropriety in concealing what is injurious to be known, or what would be of no general benefit.

6. Legislatively, I cannot join. When some specimen copies of the Cynosure reached my address, I took a copy to Mr. Shutt, editor of the Edgar County Times, and requested him to notice it in his paper. He declined on the ground that every Freemason in Paris would stop the Times at once, if they should find the slightest illusion to the Christian Cynosure therein. What is that but muzzling the press? As well might Anti-masons refuse to take any paper, if they should find it declining to notice the Cynosure! "Masons would stop the Times if we noticed any Anti-masonic paper in a favorable way." Question: Would Anti-masons stop any paper, merely because it noticed favorably some Masonic journal? I think not; and I also think that any organization that impairs and checks freedom of speech and press, must have a very bad effect on legislation and on the ermine of justice. Ought I to enter such? Is is right?

7. Historically, I cannot join. Have not the exposures of the past sufficiently established that Freemasonry is, or was, at variance with the true civil and social welfare and prosperity of this nation? I would shun profane oaths; and barbarous and demoralizing ceremonies, I would not encourage at all. Many who admit that Freemasonry has interfered with the administration of justice in the past, and who even attribute the inefficiency of our officers during the first year or two of our late war, to the complications of lodge intrigue, have never read a full history of the order, or they would know that all of its ancient landmarks are dishonesty, lustfulness and assassination. Who that can think at all, can estimate the danger to arise from extra-judicial oaths? Now, as oaths are clerly corrupting whenever used outside of properly constituted courts, the extra-judicial oaths of Mason, running through its whole history, should be sufficient to condemn it with every high-minded and upright man.

8. Matrimonially, I cannot join. To be sure, I'm not married yet; but that isn't saying that, intend to remain wifeless. I do not. Every man who is mentally, morally and physically sound needs a wife. And if I read the Bible correctly, it says, "Let every one of you in particular so love his wife even as himself."—Eph. v. 33. A man man who thus loves his wife will never keep anything concealed from her. It would be impossible for him to do so. It would never be right for me to do anything which it will be wrong for my wife (when I get her) to know. Every principle of manhood and honor teaches me never to connect myself any organization into which the future Mrs. Turney may not enter upon an equal footing with myself. By all means, brother of the undress scenery and the mystic tie, "don't tell your wife!"

9. Logically, I cannot join. Paul said, "When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child: but when I became a man, I put away childish things."—1 Cor. xiii. 11. The silly toggery, the foolish flummery, the babyish paraphernalia, the display of garbs and aprons and scarfs, might do very well for little children and half-taught pagans; but for intelligent and mature manhood, the whole thing resembles a burlesque. Bearded men playing the wonderful game of

> "Little Bo-Peep has lost his sheep
> And don't know where to find 'm!"

As Prof. Blanchard would say, "It does indeed remind a man of a parcel of calves in a pen sucking each others' ears." Verily it beats the nursery rhyme of

> "Open your mouth and shut your eyes
> And I'll give you something to make you wise."

Such men need something to make them wise. Masons who talk so much of Washington as a Freemason, seem strangely forgetful that Washington called the lodge ceremonies "for the most part mere child's play." Do you think me too hard on the venerable and august fraternity?

10. Qualifications ally, I cannot join. Shall I consent by a blind oath to keep what I know not of? Such an abrogation of my rights of conscience is something for which I do not feel prepared. God does not require such. Besides, the evil stops not here; for if such an obligation be binding at all, it must not only imply such an abrogation of every right of conscience on my part, but also an abrogation of God's authority over me. Am I prepared for this? I should think not. If I wished to enslave my fellow-beings and make tools of them, a secret society with cumulative degrees and obligations of silence and non-communicativeness, would be my most certain road to success; for such a society manipulated in my own interest and its own purposes shrewdly concealed from its votaries, could enable me to usurp and hold authority over all the rights of conscience in the most shameful and unblushing manner. Instead of that, I prefer to place my sole reliance upon the name and power of God. When nominated for Congress on the Prohibition ticket in the 16th Congressional District of Illinois, at our late election, I accepted the nomination on the ground of the principle involved, knowing that I would be defeated at the polls. So, in this matter of refusing to become a Freemason, I shall be animated and influenced by devotion and attachment to moral principles, which I hope and believe will qualify and incite me to fearless discharge of my whole duty. I have been told that my life is in peril, "and," as Paul once remarked, while treating on another question in 1 Cor. xi. 18—"and I partly believe it."

A vow or oath that contains anything calculated to foster fraud or shield vice of any kind, will instantly cancel all obligation, so far as the civil law and the Deity are concerned. And men who know of dishonorable transactions enacted and concealed under the supposed sanction and authority of Masonic obligation, have committed no perjury, either moral or legal, in exposing the same fully and clearly to the world. Hence, with these views and feelings, I do not soon expect to become an A. F. A. M.

Doctors Disagree.

BY JOHN T. KIGGINS.

I observe quite a difference between the views of Past Grand Master Rice, editor of the Masonic Advocate, and those of the Grand Master of Arkansas, relative to admitting Christ into the lodge. Mr. Rice takes the position that it is wrong to do so, while the Arkansas man says it don't matter. Mr. Rice says: "The theology of Masonry was introduced into the world long before the advent of Christianity. It is based upon the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of all men; this is its 'creed.'" (See Mackey's Jurisprudence Landmark 21 or 22.) He then goes on to state that the use of the name of Christ in Masonic prayers would be a violation of this "creed," and hence wrong. (Advocate of Aug., 1873.)

Says the Grand Master of Arkansas: "The immemorial landmarks are silent upon the subject of prayer. . . . No particular form of prayer was used in the lodges till about one hundred and twenty years ago. . . . Masonry in its original formation bore no evident form of sectarianism, [mark the word!]—a belief in God and a just reverence for him as the source of all light and truth, was the only prerequisite exacted of its initiates,—nor is more now demanded. The Jewish brother worships God as a unity; the Christian Mason worships him as a trinity. The latter in praying through his Redeemer, thereby petitions according to his theological views, and violates no landmark, nor does he infringe upon any vital principle of the order."

Evidently this Arkansas brother is "green" in Masonry, or attempting to catch "green" Christians upon this bait of liberality. For, it is both a violation of a "landmark," and an infringement of a vital principle of Masonry to pray in the name of Jesus. Mr. Mackey in his "Jurisprudence" takes the position of Mr. Rice, saying: "It is a 'landmark' that in the lodge all Masons meet 'on the level,' as the children of one great Father; and on that 'level' they are all traveling to one predestined goal." Now this is precisely the principle which Mr. Rice says is the "creed" of Masonry. and Mr. Mackey places it among the "landmarks." Arguing from this,—one of the most vital of all Masonic principles,—its universality. Mr. Rice says, in the same article quoted from above, "Our order embraces among its members every shade and hue of religious belief and opinion. As all who may be members are supposed to be present at every communication, and as the brother who prays is only acting as mouth-piece of the members, it would be improper for him to use any language to which all might not respond, 'So mote it be.'"

"Plato, thou reasonest well," and Christ hath no place in all your infidel "creed;" and a Christless "creed" is a Godless "creed," for "he that honoreth not the Son, honoreth not the Father that sent him." Let me conclude by giving you the hope which Masonry inspires in its votaries, as written and spoken by the Grand Orator of Arkansas,—here it is:

> "I know not what in store may be,
> For you my brethren, or for me;
> But this I know—since God is just—
> If in his strength we put our trust,
> Through journeys long, or good, or ill,
> His strong right arm will lead us still.
> And when we part—as part we must—
> We'll meet again—somewhere,—I trust."

Masonic Literature.

BY H. H. HINMAN.

Ecce Orienti; or rites and ceremonies of the Essenes. National Series. Arranged in accordance with the standard formula, Ipsissimis verbis. New York, Hedding & Co., 1874.

This is a little work of written Freemasonry gotten up by the craft, and for their especial benefit. The author gives as his reason for this work that the ceremonies of Masonry are so long, that they can only be retained by constant attendance on the lodge, and that this is not always practicable. Hence the necessity of some means of aiding the memory outside of the lodge. He gives the first three degrees but in abbreviations and cabalistic characters so as to be entirely unintelligible to one who has had no previous knowledge of Masonry. Without some key to it, no one would discover even the design of the work. To any one who has given the subject any attention, however, the whole book is easily deciphered. It does not differ in any essential respect from the revelations of Masonry by Morgan, Stearns, Allyn, Duncan, and Richardson. It is the same medley of frivolities and blasphemies, of moral lectures, and unholy obligations. It reveals the same disregard of truth in its perversion of the word of God, and the same contempt of Christianity in its ignoring of the Lord Jesus Christ in its ritual and forms of prayer. That Freemasons after publishing and using such a book should still pretend that Freemasonry has not been FULLY REVEALED, shows a capacity for lying, that indicates that at least one of the faculties of human nature has been largely developed by this institution. We hope to see this little work have a wide circulation and believe it to be one of the signs that this most wicked institution is tottering to its fall.

Indians and Chinese.

In the central portions of the land the Indian roams or lounges, asking now lazily now angrily, "What are you going to do with me?" Our Anglo-Saxon civilization presses in upon him both Westward and Eastward. His reservations are changed as often as Laban changed Jacob's wages, and it will not be possible for him to live as a wild man in the narrow limits between the white settlements. He must either become civilized and work like the rest of us, or be supported in his laziness by the Government, or be starved and exterminated. Some hopeful philanthropists point to the Choctaws and contend that all the Indians can learn like them to cultivate the soil. But there is little resemblance between the Indians of the desert and the Choctaws, and the more one sees of the Diggers and the Sioux the less sanguine he will be about their learning to labor. To change a race of men from warriors and hunters to farmers, this has never yet been done in a single generation, or even in a single century. The only feasible plan that I have heard of for disposing of the Indians is to make them herdsmen. Game is getting scarce, and at best is a precarious dependence. Let the Government stock the hunting grounds with cattle, furnish the Indians with horses, and put them in charge of the herds. Let the army protect these herdsmen, and see that they are faithful. Let them have a liberal supply of food. Let every inducement that a knowledge of their tastes and habits can suggest be offered to encourage them. In this way they might be trained, in time, to earn their own living, and to be useful in raising food for others. The transition from the life and habits of the hunter to that of the herdsman is not very great. The herdsman does not need nearly as much territory to support him as the hunter. He can pursue his calling nearer to the settlements of the cultivators of the soil, and freer from antagonism with them. The more I have studied this Indian problem the stronger is my conviction that its solution must be found in this direction.

On this coast we have the Chinese question. It is Europe that troubles the East; Africa that troubles the South; Aboriginal America that troubles the Center, and Asia that troubles the West. The whole world comes to us to test our faith, our courage, and the strength of our free institutions. The Asiatic element is the most recent, and as yet the smallest. But it bids fair to be the largest ere long. We have four millions or so of Africans and their descendants in the South. But China, brought close to us by steam, has four hundred millions of people; twice as many as the land can sustain. They must go somewhere. They can do better here easily and cheaply. Why then don't they come and keep coming until they overrun the whole country? An emigration of one-tenth of the Chinese would scarcely be felt at home, but it would make the United States a semi-heathen country. It is contended that we need the Chinese to develop the material resources of this coast, just as we needed the bone and muscle of Ireland to dig our canals and grade our railroads. But while the Irish dug our canals, they undermined our Sabbath, our school-system, and made Romanism and whiskey controlling elements in our politics. It is questioned whether this emigration has not cost more than it has been worth —whether we would not be better off with less material development, and a more homogeneous and moral population.—Herald and Presbyter.

An Argument in Syllogism.

Masonry is either a good institution or a bad one.

It is either a friend and aid to Christianity, or it is a foe and an anti-Christ.

If a good institution, it is a very good one; if bad, it is superlatively bad.

If it is a bad institution, it has no right to the fellowship or sanction of the church.

If it is a wicked institution, it is the duty of the ministry and the church to disfellowship and denounce it. Let us have a syllogism or two.

Any institution which perverts justice, and protects criminals, is a bad one. Masonry does this; therefore,

Masonry is a bad institution.

A religious system rejecting Christ from its prayers and ritual, must be an anti-Christ.

Masonry does so reject Christ; therefore,

Masonry is an anti-Christ.

Any person adhering to and obeying the laws of an anti-Christian system, has no right to belong to a Christian church.

Every Mason belongs to such a system; therefore,

No Mason should be permitted to belong to a Christian church.

An institution whose history is a lie, and whose claims to benevolence and to be a saving power are false, must be a bad institution.

Masonry is such an institution; therefore,

Masonry is a bad institution.

An institution perverting justice, endorsing murder, and blotting the Christ of the Bible from its religious system, ought to be exposed and overthrown.

Masonry as an institution has done all this, and has shown no signs of repentence; therefore,

Masonry ought to be overthrown.

Any system claiming to be a government and announcing itself as a "perfect despotism" has no right to exist in a free country.

Masonry is such a system; therefore,

Masonry has no right to exist in this country.

From what I have just said—and the work of sustaining the affirmative of every proposition laid down is an easy one—it follows that the work of awakening the slumbering people to a sense of the dangers surrounding them from oath-bound secrecy—the rescuing of Government offices from the hands of the lodge—the redemption of the press—the divorce of the church from the lodges, and the final overthrow of Masonry and kindred organizations—is a labor which ought to be entered upon by every enlightened Christian and citizen in the land; and that ignorance of the facts I have alluded to, and the duty they enforce, will to many soon become a crime against the community, against country, and against God.—From Elder Barlow's Address at Lockport.

Reform News.

—The General Agent, Rev. J. P. Stoddard, expects to be in Chicago next week.

—Rev. R. Faurot, of DuPlain, Clinton Co., Mich., and Rev. A. H. Springstein, of Ypsilanti, will lecture as they have opportunity and time to do so during the season. Bro. Springstein is a seceding Mason. At the last conference of the Free Methodist Church at Albion, Mich., he left the M. E. church and united with the body which has no fellowship with the lodge.

Jottings from the New York Field.

"Once more into the breach dear friends!"

Dear K:—My last from the front closed up with the report of a raid into Niagara county, not far from the middle of November. Taking a severe cold after my closing lecture at Pendleton, I returned to Syracuse, to be laid up for some weeks, having all the time afforded me that I needed for a sick pell, as also to make preparation as I convalesced for our State meeting, of which you have already published the proceedings.

During all this time from Nov. 12 to Dec. 21, the doors of the lecture field seemed to be effectually barred against me. At length, however, I received a call from Bro. Krahl, a Wesleyan pastor at Eagle Harbor, in Orleans Co., to come and assist him in a quarterly meeting, on Saturday and Sabbath before our State meeting at Lockport. I preached for this brother and his people twice on each day, with much comfort to myself if to nobody else. I certainly had the closest attention of my audience, which might have been caused by a pardonable curiosity to see how a so-called "Close-communion Baptist" would manage in such peculiar circumstances. It was rather new to me, but I lived through it; and I have only to say, if my Wesleyan friends suffered no worse than I did by our meeting together on that occasion, no serious damage was inflictedr while I may be allowed to hope some good was done. My warmest thanks are hereby tendered to Bro. and sister Krahl for their unceasing kindness to me, and for the religious enjoyment they afforded me, while under their care. They with their people are true friends of our cause.

On Monday eve I spoke to a large audience, on my special work. After my lecture, a gentleman who was present told me that when plowing in a field, not far from the famed "Ridge Road," in the fall of 1826, he was called up from his work, ordered to feed his team, which was afterward hitched to a "mysterious carriage," and driven away with it. This carriage contained Wm. Morgan, and the man who owned the team, and for whom my informant was working, was James Mather, whose brother, Elihu Mather, figures so largely among the abductors of the unhappy Morgan. The same gentleman informed me that his employer died a fool, as, if I mistake not, did his brother Elihu. Human justice failing to reach the measure of their guilt, they seem to have been smitten of God in this world.

I need say nothing to your readers about our State meeting only that it was, in spite of all adverse circumstances, a success. The presence and wise councils of Bro. Stoddard were a source of comfort and strength to us in the midst of the great sorrow overshadowing us from the recent death of our good and true Bro. Adam Crooks.

Meeting at Lockport our true yokefellow in this reform, Rev. N. Wardner, I accepted an invitation from him to the extreme northeastern portion of our State, at West Chazy and vicinity. Accordingly, after a talk with Bro. Stoddard and our Executive Committee, which seemed to leave me no alternative but to stay in the lecture field, I left Syracuse at 4 A. M. on Wednesday, Dec. 30, for Clinton Co. When I made my way to the cars the moon was shining brightly, and everything bade fair for a lovely day. But not more than half an hour had elapsed before we were pushing our way through a blinding snow storm to the north, and the day passed with alternate sun-shine, and fierce snow squalls, the cold increasing from hour to hour. Between 6 and 7 P. M. I met Bro. Wardner on the platform at West Chazy, and was escorted by him to his hospitable home, where I was welcomed by himself, his wife, and all his household, and treated more like a brother beloved than like a stranger. May the good Lord reward them as I cannot.

The pastor of the Wesleyan church, Bro. Benton, having a donation that evening, of course we had no lecture, but on Thursday evening, the last of the old year, I opened fire on the "Old handmaid" and kept it up, that and the two following nights, with good effect. Bro. Wardner had prepared this community for the recep- of the word by his own public as well as private efforts. On this first evening the Worshipful Master of Northern Light Lodge was present, but I saw him no more during the lectures, though other members of the craft kept eye and ear open all through. At the close of my lecture on the oaths, ceremonies, etc., a gentleman present, once a member of the lodge here, being called on, rose and said that in "substance all I had said was true." He went on to say that for saying what he had three death penalties were hanging over his head; and farther, that he had children growing up and he would sooner see them in their graves than to have them join a Masonic lodge. This was said with such feeling as to touch all hearts present which had not been calloused under the blasting influence of Masonic osths.

On Sabbath I was called upon to take part in the memorial service held by the church for Bro. Crooks. How this man was loved by the Wesleyans! And he was worthy of it all. In the evening I preached, and next day took up the march for Mooer's Junction, some ten miles away, where I was taken in charge and cared for by the pastor, Rev. Mr. Curtis, and his wife, where I spoke Monday and Tuesday evenings to large audiences, among whom were many Masons, who behaved on the whole like gentlemen, though once in a while a "jewel" would break loose for a moment to be caught and caged again. At the close of my last discourse, two young bucks of not very prepossessing appearance declared in loud voice that before the year was out they would join the lodge. I should have considered it an equivocal compliment, had I congratulated the craft on this threatened accession to their ranks. So from fear of being arrested for "cruelty to animals," I refrained. One young man of quite another style, said "I had thought of joining the Masons, but I have done with that now!"

Bro. Wardner, and his good lady were present on Tuesday evening and after the lecture took me in charge for a sleigh ride of some seven miles back to West Chazy, where we arrived not far from eleven o'clock P. M.; took some oysters "done to a turn," and retired to rest. Next day Bro. Wardner went with me some eight miles away in another direction, to West Plattsburg. Here I spoke two evenings, expecting to spend Friday and Saturday evenings at Cadyville; but alas! the pastor, for prudential reasons, had declined giving out our appointments. We commend this brother to the nursing care of our Wesleyan friends. He certainly needs a little propping up. He seems to be troubled with a disease very prevalent in some circles, but I am especially sorry to find it where I had so little expected to meet with it. It is a bad disease, and makes him who is affected with it appear despicable to every one but himself.

"O wad the powers some giftie gie us
To see oursels as others see us."

The common name of this distemper suggests a physical basis, but is believed to be something deeper and more baneful—even affecting the moral man. It is commonly known as "Oueak Neas." I had not expected to find this among our Wesleyan friends, though so common among the larger and more popular denominations. But as I go about among the ruins of our fallen humanity, I am painfully impressed with the truth of that sublime sentiment uttered many years ago by Dea. Bedott to his wife Priscilla whom he called Sylla for short: "Says he to me, says he, Sylla! says I to him says I what? Says he to me, says he, Sylla! We're all poor critters!" Alas, how true! I saw in that region some other symptoms of the spread of this fretting, moral leprosy. If it is not checked soon, I may be impelled to say something more about it hereafter.

This failure to give out appointments at the place named above, broke up my plans for a week. Bro Wardner, like a good genius, came to my rescue, and took me home again to wait further developemnts. I rested from labor Friday and Saturday nights, Jan. 8th, and 9th; but on Sabbath was pressed into the pulpit, morning and evening; when some interest manifesting itself meetings were continued during the four following days, I preaching every evening, with much reason to thank God for some good results. On Thursday evening, Jan. 14th, my labors closed at West Chazy, and your readers will next hear from me at Ellenburg, some 20 miles away. Adieu.

J. L. Barlow.

From a Virginia Pastor.

Lebanon Church, Va.

Dear friends of truth and workers in the cause I dearly love and cherish:—I write to inform you that the Cynosure is at hand, for which I thank you. I am pleased with it. It breathes the spirit of pure and glorious truth. You may consider me a life-long subscriber. I am a total anti-secret man, being a minister of the openly-proclaimed Gospel of Jesus Christ. I cannot endorse the vile working of darkness. I will for the benefit of those concerned and for the purpose of aiding in the work of reform, state a little of my experience concerning Freemasonry.

I have been told by members of the professed human-family-benefitingfraternity that there are no true Freemasons in the world. For Freemasonry consists in the religion of Jesus Christ. Is that not denying that Christ has any followers? . . . O blasting, blighting Masonry! It is written hidden things shall be revealed and secret things be made known. How can you escape the scrutinizing power of inspiration? Your destiny is foretold. Your doom is sealed.

I was told also by one of the dupes of Jesuitism that the Apostle Paul was a Freemason. To which I replied, if he was he said nothing about it in his Epistle, and he kept back nothing that was profitable; therefore allowing that he was, Masonry is unprofitable. Paul was no Mason unless Masonry consists in the religion of Christ. To which he replied, "It does." I told him that I was a Mason, for I am lifting a warning voice against the evils of the age, while the oath-bound fraternity who meet in lodge are practicing these very evils.

The religion of the Bible is not Masonry. Masonry and all other secret societies are as far from God as the Publican was from the Pharisee when they went into the temple to pray; as far as God is from mammon. "Afar off," is the inspired phrase, and only by the blood of Jesus can they be brought nigh. I am no Mason only for argument's sake as in the case above. All Freemasons do either lie in word or action. Those in the pulpit are the worst, they preach one thing and practice quite another.

J. R. S. Mourey.

The First of the Sabbaths.

London, Ont., Jan. 15, 1875.

Christian Cynosure:—You profess to be undenominational. It surprised me to see Bro. R. M. Lampard's views in your issue of the 7th inst. on the Seventh Day Sabbath. Will you please give me space to reply? But hope you have something better.

Glad to find Bro. L. has been so long a subscriber; that he does not observe Christmas as a divinely appointed holiday, nor call the "First of Sabbaths," Sunday.

But we regard the death of Jesus as the fundamental "glory of the Christian system." The resurrection is the prelude to the crowning glory "of the N. T. dispensation. Then was the stone, rejected of the builders, made the head of the corner. Mat. xxi. 42; Ps. cxviii. 22; Mar. xii. 10; Luk. xx. 17; Act. iv. 11; 1 Pet. ii. 7. Jesus was declared to be the Son of God with power, (Rom. i. 4) by the resurrection from the dead." This was the grand theme of the apostle's preaching.

The cross shows us Jesus passive love; the empty tomb, his triumphant love; the pentecostal effusion, his royal love. A memorial of each is presented to us in the New Testament, the Lord's supper, baptism, and the "First of Sabbaths." It is the first day Sabbath.

By consulting your Greek Testament you will find that it is called the "First of Sabbaths" in eight places. (Mat. xxviii. 1; Mar. xvi. 2. 9; Luke xxiv. 1; John xx. 1. 29; Act. xx. 7; 1 Cor. xvi. 2.) Hence it is called in prophecy "the day which the Lord hath made." Ps. cxviii. 24; and the "Lord's day" Rev. i. 10. It may well be called the "First of Sabbaths," first in importance, though not first in time.

The psalmist David speaks of this "Sabbatism" in Psa. xcv. 8, and Paul says (Heb. iv. 9,) it remained for the people of God, and was now entered into (iv. 4.) by them that believe. There are then the Edenic Sabbath; the Sabbath of rest in Canaan; and the resurrection Sabbath given by Jesus, the second Joshua. Was not redemption work, when finished by Jesus at the tombs, more glorious than the first creation work? 2. Therefore is Jesus, the Son of man, the Lord of the Sabbath?

Why should Bro. L. and his co-religionists not follow the example of Jesus and his apostles? Their example establishes the law of "use and wont." This is often regarded as the strongest form of law. God's example was the grand form of the law for the first Sabbath; why should not the example of Jesus be the grand law for resting in the Christian dispensation?

Jesus repeatedly blessed his desciples as they met on this the first day of the week. On this day he poured out his Holy Spirit in miraculous fulness. On this day his disciples met to break bread and preach the word. On this day they laid by them as God had prospered them for the poor at Jerusalem. On this day John was in the spirit and received the revelations at Patmos. Why then should we be called children of the Papacy, because we follow the example of Jesus and his apostles? They have left us an example. Their example is our law. Let all follow their steps.

The Seventh-Day Sabbath countenances the Jews in their denial of our Lord's resurrection. Freemasons have joined the Jews in expelling Jesus, the Son of God, from their lodge. The Jews have joined the Freemasons in bowing down to images, and worshiping the "sun, moon and the star of their God Rempham." They swear by their name also, on bended knee! It is matter of deepest regret, that any professed Christian should join with both, in trampling the Sabbath of Sabbaths under their feet, and in calling it an unholy day!

He who blessed his disciples with peace, who sent down the Holy Spirit in fire, who revealed himself so often to the assembled disciples in the breaking of bread, who taught them to be bountiful as well as to expect bounty, and who cheered his beloved John with such blessed revelations on this his own day, intends that we should not forsake the assembling of ourselves together on this day, till the end of the world. Herein he shows that he is "God over all, and blessed for ever." He, who made all things at first for his own glory, and then rested, and was refreshed, was the same who finished the far more wonderful and blessed work of redemption, and rested from his work and was refreshed on this "First of Sabbaths." He claims it as his own, calls it by his name. Shows us that he is "Lord over all to the glory of God the Father;" that he is our Lord and that we should worship him.

May the faithful observance of this day be the constant source of national vigor, as it is, and we trust ever shall be, one of the strongest pillars of your National Christian Association.

Dea. Stephen Parker's "Experience Out of Masonry."

Dear Cynosure:—At the quarterly meeting of our N. E. Pa., Association some little time since, in Waverly, Luzerne Co., Pa. Dea. Stephen Parker, a member and officer in the Abington Baptist Church, of the very best standing, stated publicly the substance of the following letter. Thinking that it was altogether too good to be lost, I requested him to write it out, and send it to me, that I might make more public use of it. Believing that it would interest your readers, I send it to you for publication. It with my annual subscription I trust will be accepted.

Yours, &c. Albert L. Post.

Montrose, Pa.

Abington, Pa., May 28, 1874.

To Rev. A. L. Post:

Dear Brother in Christ:—I pen a few lines to you in regard to my experience in Masonry, or, I might say, out of it. When a boy, 14 and 15 years of age, attended the Masonic gatherings called St. John's, in Sherburne, Chenango County, N. Y. The Masons marched through the streets with white aprons and other regalia to please the eye, with good music, the square, compass, and a Bible in hand. I thought it grand and made up my mind that I would be a Mason as soon as my age would admit. I had three uncles, two who lived in Sherburne, and one that lived near Norwich, the county seat, who were Masons, and in the procession. I thought they looked nobly. They were pretty good looking and good moral men, and men that I loved very much. They always said that Masonry was a charitable, benevolent institution. They never said anything to me about joining the lodge, for I was too young; but I desired to know the secret of the thing and have as neat regalia as they had, and meet and have as good times as they had. I think the last Masonic St. Johns that I attended was in the Sherburne village, in the year 1826. I had a pleasant time, not knowing the wickedness of the order.

A few months after this the report came that one William Morgan, of Batavia, had been murdered by Masons for revealing the secrets of Masonry. I saw my uncles who lived near by; asked them what it meant, and they said there was no truth in it. Morgan has only got up a book to make money. He has gone off, and got agents selling his lies to make money. He will be home soon. I asked them "why the Masons did not meet as they had formerly, in the lodges?" They said that "Masonry was so pure and good, that if there was any disturbance, they could not go on with it." I was not old enough to be a Mason yet, and began to be an Anti-mason. My brother, older, took an Anti-masonic paper, which I had the privilege of reading. It was printed in Norwich, Chenango county, I think, by Mr. Prindle. My brother found in the paper the proceedings of the court, and saw an article stating that Uncle G., who lived near the county-seat, was empaneled to sit on a case as juryman. One of the party objected to his sitting, and asked him the following questions: "Are you a Mason?" He says, "Yes." "Have you read Morgan's Book on Masonry?" "Yes." "Have you read Bernard's Light on Masonry?" He says, "Yes." "Are Bernards' and Morgan's books true?" "Yes, so far as I know." My brother read this article to my uncles who lived near by us, and they said, "Uncle G. never said so." It was nothing but "Anti-mason lies." In a few weeks this juryman came to see my uncles who lived near by, and they three came to my brother's. My brother got his paper and said, "Uncle G. I have got a few words to read to you." He replied, "I will hear it." My brother then read the proceedings of the court as before stated, and asked, "Is this so?" uncle says, "it is just so," and turned to the other two saying, "You know it is the truth." They said then, "If these books are true, you should have your throat cut from ear to ear." "For what?" says Uncle G. "For revealing the secrets of Masonry." Uncle G. says, "I have revealed no secret; Morgan revealed the secret. I only acknowledge it to be true." I never had any desire to join any secret organization since. I have become a member of the Baptist church and profess to take the Bible as my guide. I hope the time will come when all of our preachers will not be afraid to speak against all manner of sin for fear it will hurt some of the brotherhood. STEPHEN PARKER.

OUR MAIL.

B. N. Cross, Cedar Falls, Ia., writes:

"You can mark me as a true friend to the good cause. I like the Cynosure as well as any paper I ever read. I shall try and send you some subscribers 'ere long. I should like to hear a course of lectures against the vile institution."

A. Wardner, Windsor, Vt., writes:

"I am near the close of the ninth decade of my existence. . My early associates in our cause are in their graves. Be not discouraged. There will be an awakening before long. Persevere."

Rev. I. A. Hart, who is now in Wisconsin, sends "A happy New Year."

John Fetterhoff, Chambersburg, Pa., writes:

"I know no man that is connected with secrecy and advocates it, that has much of the power and love of God in his soul, or enjoys heavenly mindedness and stands decided for God and his cause. Such are mostly undecided. They seek to stand between the church and the world; between God and the devil; and try hard to be in sympathy with both."

Wm. Small, Xenia, Ind., writes:

"The official reports of the Masonic lodges in Indiana for the last year represent the Xenia Lodge as follows: No. of lodge 267; initiated 4; passed 3; raised 2; affiliated 2; demitted 4; suspended for nonpayment of dues 8; expelled 4; number of members 67."

Let us have more statistics. These are encouraging.

Rev. Elmore Harrow, Woodland, Cal., writes:

"It seems to me there is no State in the Union where a lecturer is needed worse than in California. The people of California generally are resolute when they are enlisted. Now is the time for ardent work. The inhabitants are just coming to be settled, and many Masons and Odd-fellows have not been in the lodge for some time, consequently they would not be so hard to educate. Again the facilities for attending lodge are not good; but they are preparing to build heathen temples. The abominable grange has about come to a stand. In some places it has stood a little too long. Some are coming out now, and wish they had not joined. When will the people of this glorious republic cease to be made the dupes of devil-worshipers and pick-pockets? I have been driven from my fields of labor mostly in consequence of these institutions which draw in young men and teach them to forsake the religion of the Bible."

Orrin Sholes, Morrison, Ill., writes:

"I pray God to let the mantle of Messrs. Crooks and Smith fall upon some young man that will fill their places. I think if we had a good lecturer with us we might organize a good strong society at this time."

Perley Mitchel, Terre Haute, Ind., writes:

"I have been a subscriber to your paper for three years, and the longer I read it the better I like it. I am now in my eightieth year and have been an Anti-secretist ever since the Morgan abduction and murder. I moved here last September, from Bloomingdale, Ind. The great difficulty in getting subscribers for your paper is because Masonry has got such a strong hold on the clergy, judges, lawyers and editors, they say it is useless to resist. What we want is a competent lecturer."

John W. Gilbert, Lexington, Ill., writes:

"I am pastor of the United Brethren church at Lexington, Ill. Have been in a glorious revival for the last four weeks. Up to date fifty have joined the church, and more will join."

We rejoice to hear such glad tidings.

Chas. T. Collins, Windsor, Conn., writes:

"Brother John Levington is with us; has given three lectures and has done much good."

Rev. C. R. Baker, Windham Center, Ont., writes:

"A glorious work is being accomplished in this county of Norfolk, through the Cynosure, in pulling down the strongholds of secret societies. Men are getting ashamed of the orders, and the halls are almost forsaken in places. A good old man said to me to-day that he told the people that the Christian Cynosure was the only Christian paper that was published, that is, with the least mixture of error; and that if every one who speaks denies what it contains, they deny the teaching of the Bible. . . I shall do all I can to aid you in your glorious work. . . I am working in the ministry as a Free-will Baptist. My prayer to God is that the light may continue to spread until the power of darkness be overthrown."

P. B. Chamberlain, Walla Walla, Wash. Ter., writes:

"Wm. M. Willis requested me to say that he wishes to be considered a 'life subscriber, and in no case are you to discontinue his paper until after you have published his obituary notice in it.'"

We are glad to hear of so many friends who rank themselves life subscribers. We are obliged to put the care of our mail list largely into the hands of clerks. So we want these subscribers to send us a card saying they will renew soon, or else send their renewals promptly. We do not want to slight or forget our friends, but they must help us remember to keep their names on the mail list.

S. Chrimes, Streator, Ill., writes:

"Though there should be no loaf in the cupboard, or calf in the stall, I will be opposed to the unfruitful works of darkness. My opposition to Masonry has made me many enemies; but the Savior said to his apostles, 'If the world hate you ye know that it hated me before it hated you.' I have been a Methodist half a century in England and America, yet I cannot go to the Methodist church now. The minister is a Mason, and one of the leading members is the Most Worshipful Master; and most of the officers in the church are Masons, and I do not like to go where the devil has such a stronghold. Lord Jesus cleanse thy church."

We suggest to all our friends that whenever they find a professing Christian a Mason, they seek opportunities to go to such prayerfully, and try to show them the sinfulness of the institution, and give them something to read on this subject. Pray that their eyes may be opened. Perhaps through God's grace you may gain a brother. Let us also labor and pray that the church may be cleansed.

Rev. C. E. Harroun, Jr., Dewitt, Ia., writes:

"I have been a reader of its (the Cynosure's) pages more or less since its appearance on the field of battle. I am much pleased with its tone, spirit and method of attack against that great mystery of iniquity, secretism."

Geo. H. Starring, Clarkston, Mich., writes:

"The present finds me situated in a town which is a fair representation of Sodom of old. I can assign no other reason for it than this: It is a town corrupted by Masonry. I shall stay here probably two months, and I would like to prepare a lecture and work against Masonry."

We are glad this friend sensibly undertakes to make things better. We hope all our friends who are attempting to uproot Masonry will strive to plant Christ. He will be with you, if (first trusting and obeying him yourself) you point men to the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world.

J. B. Stowell, Middleton, Idaho Ter., writes:

"I am doing what I can for the cause that is near my heart, the overthrow of Masonry. I have suffered a great deal at their hands, but still live. We . . . have hada very uncommon storm in the mountains."

Samuel H. Gilbert, Constantine, Mich., writes:

"I am in the midst of evil. Freemasons, Odd-fellows and grangers on every side. I belong to the Baptist church and fear not to say that it (the lodge) is no place for a Christian, fearing not the contradiction of any one. While I have been writing, my mother, almost seventy years old, has been reviving our memories with the history of Morgan's murder."

J. D. Baker, Plymouth, Ill., writes:

"I take periodicals but none that is in any danger of supplanting the Cynosure. I prize it more than its cost. It fills a gap in the land unenvied by others at present; but when its mission shall be accomplished in casting down the walls of secretism, there will be many, doubtless, who will not refuse to share its glory, by crying Babylon! that great city is fallen."

S. Knapp, Joliet, Ill., writes:

"I cannot write intelligibly as I have lost the use of my right hand; but please allow me to bid you God speed in your self-sacrificing work; second, I think to no other."

G. W. Keller, Newton, Kan., writes:

"I am getting a good many names on the petition, and will do all I can. I could give you some preacher's names who would take the Cynosure, but the grasshoppers ate them out."

If any friends wish to aid these Western sufferers by sending them the Cynosure for a year we have abundant opportunity, invest for them. One, discontnuing the paer, writes:

"It is hard to say farewell."

Rev. O. M. Owen, Fulton, N. Y., writes:

"It (the Cynosure) deserves the support of all true Americans."

Mr. C. Quick, Weston, Mich., writes:

"I am glad to see the work going on organizing State associations. When are we going to have one in Michigan? I have been waiting to hear some response to the proposition to secure Bro. D. P. Rathbun for State Lecturer. Brethren, let us hear from you through the Cynosure in regard to this matter. He did a grand work in his recent tour through the State, and the harvest is ripe for the right man to enter in and reap."

Mrs. Susannah G. Reed, N. Hannibal, N. Y., writes:

"I have been trying for three years to get means to take the Cynosure, but have failed until the present time. I am very much opposed to secret societies, and have been ever since the exposure by Wm. Morgan. I have ever kept one of Giddin's almanacs to show the people the evils of Masonry. I am past seventy years, and have but little time longer to oppose the evils that surround the country; and as I am a widow of limited means, I can only keep my mite in circulation. God is able to bless you and the cause you are enlisted in."

E. W. Horr, Angola, Ind., writes:

"This makes seven new subscribers from me. I am encouraged. The leaven is still working."

We are encouraged also.

P. G. Norwood, Harford, N. Y., writes:

"Your paper makes the heathen rage."

James Robinson, Washburn, Ill., writes:

"I am of the same opinion of Mr. Sherman, that the only way to put down Masonry is by the ballot-box. Masonry is the main horse to ride into office; and we, the people, want to ride too. Our candidate for Congress in our district was beaten this fall on account of the Masons holding the balance of power."

Rev. S. S. Barton, Hopewell Center, N. Y., writes:

"God bless the cause is my prayer every day. Anti-masonry is part of my religion."

Mrs. S. Mills, Richland, Mich., writes:

"Glad we have a paper not afraid to speak plainly on the subjects of reform, especially the great evils of secretism and intemperance; and that you place the use of tobacco along by the side of rum. I have been trying to do something in this cause for years. I am now almost eighty."

Lawrence Miller, Warren, Ill., writes:

"The poor people of our town dare not say anything about the secret societies for they are immediately told if they do not hold their peace they cannot get any more work from them (the secret clans.) We got up Anti-secret prayer-meetings, and some of that poor class came to our meetings. . . I asked one of them why he did not come to our prayer-meetings any more, and he told me he dare not do it; if he did, they would starve him out. This is Masonry in Warren."

Rev. J. W. Raynor, Union Dale, Pa., writes:

"I wish you a happy New Year in your hearts, homes, and in your noble work. . . Would not the name American Reform Party be better than the shorter one which will suggest to many minds national prejudice, and awaken thoughts as to its former use by Know-Nothings? Let us push our work and have a basis for consistent, Christian, political action."

Lesson for Feb. 7th.—Achan's Sin.

Joshua vii. 19–25.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And he said unto them, Take heed and beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth. —Lu. xii. 15.

NOTES.

As in the early history of the Christian church the disciples, before proceeding to the conquest of the world for Christ, received in the death of Ananias and Sapphira a solemn warning of the danger of allowing the allegiance of their hearts to be divided between the world and the Lord, so in the beginning of the war with the Canaanites the children of Israel were admonished, though the case of Achan, of the necessity of rendering implicit obedience to the command of God.

I. THE ORIGIN OF ACHAN'S SIN.

God had commanded that every portion of the spoil of Jerico should be devoted to himself (chap. vi. 18. 19). This was known and understood by Achan. Yet he disobeyed the injunction, and in the words of his confession he gives us the natural history of his iniquity: "I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonish garment, and two hundred shekels of silver, and a wedge of gold of fifty shekels weight; and I coveted them, and took them." Here are the three stages. He saw, he coveted, he took. They remind us of the history of the first sin: "When the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat." (Gen. iii. 6), and of the words of James: "Then when lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death." The garment and the silver and the gold were attractive, but they belonged to God, and a loyal spirit would not even have looked at them. The lust of the eye preceeds the lust of the flesh. Let us therefore be on our guard against this beginning of sin.

II. The Guilt of Achan's Sin.

This is very fully set forth in verse 11: (1) it was a transgression of the covenant, an act of disobedience to Him whom they had all pledged themselves to obey; but it was (2) an act of dishonesty. The spoil of Jericho belonged to God. He had especially reserved that for himself. Nay, more, he had himself taken Jericho. The Israelites had not overcome it by their own valor. The Lord had overturned its walls by his might, and therefore he had a clear right to dispose of its spoil. Further, it was (3) an act of deceit; for Achan had hidden it in his tent. He tried to dissemble, forgetting that God could see in secret. No truth is so frequently forgotten by the sinner as this. Because we see not God, we are apt to imagine that he does not see us. But he beholds our hidden iniquities. "He hath set our secret sins in the light of his countenance" (see here Ps. cxxxix.)

III. The Consequence of Achan's Sin.

This was the defeat of the men of Israel who went up to take Ai, a city of Canaan, which lies somewhat to the east of Bethel, and which has been identified with the modern Tell-el-Hajar. The people of Israel were a unit, and when one individual sinned the whole commonwealth suffered. "As clearly as the whole Scripture makes the individual an object of divine mercy and justice, so clearly does it teach us also to regard the totality of a people as an organic unity, in which the individuals are members of the body, and not capable of being separated as so many atoms from the whole."—Keil. The same thing holds of the Christian church; for, as Paul has made clear (1 Cor. xii. 12–27); "We are the body of Christ, and members in particular." Hence the sin of one member affects the whole body, and it may be that the failures of the church in its conflicts with the world, or in its efforts for the conversion of men, are owing to the fact that many of its members have committed a trespass in some accursed thing." The diseased sheep may infect a flock, and one covetous or depraved member may paralyze the efforts of a whole congregation. Even in the last discourses of Jesus it would almost seem as if the presence of Judas repressed the out-gushing of the Redeemer's breast; for so soon as the traitor left, the Lord Jesus soared into the region of his glory, and began to speak in a far more ecstatic strain than that which he had been using, (see John xiii. 27–32). Here is a strong argument for purity of communion in the church, and for holiness of life in all who are connected with the church.

IV. The Discovery of Achan's Sin.

The man who has been hypocritically hiding his sin, while yet he has been occupying a prominent place in the church, will sooner or later be exposed; and even if the exposure do not come in this life, it will surely come in the future. "Be sure your sin will find you out." These words are not more true than they are terrible. They teach, not simply that the sin will be found out, but something far more dreadful, that it will find out the sinner, and that means that it will fasten on him and work out its retribution in him.

V. The Punishment of Achan's Sin.

This was very severe. He and his sons and his daughters were stoned with stones, and burned with fire, and his entire property was destroyed. We can understand why Achan should be put to death, but the execution of his sons and daughters perplexes us. Perhaps they were cognizant of their father's sin, and aiders and abettors in his wickedness. But even if they were not, we see in Providence now the same mystery which meets us here. The child is diseased and dies because of the parent's sin. The drunkard's punishment falls not on himself alone, but on all who are connected with him. The criminal's family are forever after at a disadvantage from his crime.

Lessons—1. We cannot perish alone. Of Achan it is said (Josh. xxii. 20) "that man perished not alone in his iniquity," and the same is true of every son of perdition. We are so linked together that some one must be eternally affected by our conduct. No one goes to destruction alone. 2. The punishments which God inflicts should be remembered for our warning. Joshua called the place of Achan's stoning the valley of trouble, and raised there a cairn, which might witness the future generations of the danger and the consequences of sin. The Bible is full of such beacons—let us give good heed to the warnings they convey. 3. When we put away sin, then we may begin to hope in God. Hosea says in one of his prophecies (chap. ii. 15), "I will give her the valley of Achor for a door of hope." There is no hope for Israel so long as Achan and his sin are tolerated; but when we follow God's directions fully, even trouble becomes the portal of hope. 4. Confession gives glory to God. To hide sin may secure us a little longer honor among men; but if we want to glorify God, we will make confession.—Working Church.

"Masonic Inconsistency."

[From the St Louis Freemason.]

Under this head, in the October number of the Voice of Masonry, of Chicago, brother Jacob Norton, of Boston, has an article, written in his pointed manner, and incisive, and which is replied to by the editor of the Voice. Brother Norton desires to show that the Freemasonry of America is not so free as it is even in Great Britain, from which it was originally imported, while it should be quite as much so, inasmuch as in America there are as many representatives of every people and nation in Europe; that in America Christianity rules Masonry, and, in subservience to Christian ideas, the initial promises made by American Freemasonry in the lodge are not kept; and in this manner Masonry is inconsistent at least, if not untruthful and deceptive.

I am personally well acquainted with brother Norton, and believe him to be a man of too liberal mind to write "Christianity a sham" unqualifiedly, or in the manner printed in the article "Masonic Inconsistency." In common with a few others, he has for some years been endeavoring to induce the Grand Lodge of Massachusetts to expunge from the ritual of the lodges governed by that body all statements concerning and reference to the Saints John, as such reference and statements are offensive to all who are not Christians; and some of those statements are as well offensive to truth, as they are unsupported by historic knowledge in the possession of any man regarding them. Possibly there are many other exceptionable statements in the ritual of Freemasonry in America, and which being equally antagonistic with truth, so far as known regarding the subjects of these statements, should also be expunged. But brother Norton's success in Massachusetts has, so far, been no greater than brother Solomon's, in the same direction and with the same object, in New York. The statements anent the Saints John are retained, for the reason, among others probably, that those who hitherto have initiated the movement against them are not confessedly Christians, but Israelites, commonly called Jews, by profession of faith; and the large majority of Freemasons in those States being Christians by profession of faith, do not propose to change the ritual, as I have heard it expressed, "to gratify a handful of Jews," whatever they might do were the movement adopted and advocated by so large a number of their Christian brethren as to make it important, and attention to it necessary.

Under this view of the case, possibly, brother Norton has directed his pen at the inconsistency of Freemasons who, while stating to the initiate that he would find nothing in the lodge offensive to his religious or political opinions, yet almost immediately thereafter make within the hearing of the initiate, and drill him into the repetition of statements which are offensive to his religious opinions, and to his knowledge of historic facts and persons—statements which, in the very nature of the matters recounted therein, could not be true, and hence were offensive, as well, to truth and morality.

Now in this regard, pure minded men, who value Freemasonry as a pure and valuable system of ethics, conceive that there is unfair dealing exercised; and it is this style of dealing brother Norton, brother Solomons and other Israelites, and many Christian brethren as well, desire to have no longer obtain.

It is not unsafe to say that there are several thousand Israelites in the United States at the present time Freemasons. But, on the other hand, there are several hundred thousand Christians who also are Freemasons, and the large majority of the latter are quite content to have the objectionable statements in the Masonic Lodge Ritual remain there. Individually or collectively they are not offended by those statements; nor do the learned among them, although on first hearing them, if questioned concerning them, they may pronounce them in our opinion to be false, refuse to repeat them as freely as if they were true. With equal propriety could these very learned, and others not so learned, pronounce a score or less statements made in the rituals of orthodox Christian churches, in their opinion, false and objectionable; nevertheless they do not, nor attach any personal offensiveness to them. They did not make, originate, nor put them there, and they do not propose their removal, but, on the contrary, are satisfied to repeat them once a week or oftener, and even assume to believe them true, and in part maintain their Christian standing in society by such assumption, and this without conceiving they are committing any sin, or inconsistency even, or being offensive to any man.

For the same reason, and with the same motives, doubtless, thousands, and tens and hundreds of thousands, of Christian Freemasons take the Masonic lodge ritual, as it is communicated and known to them, not as history to be by them corrected where shown to be wrong or in error, but as the language of certain ceremonies arranged many years ago, and preserved essentially in the same form, and containing as nearly as possible the same words and statements then introduced by the early Masons in America for the purpose of maintaining a language in manner intended to be, so to say, universal; and they know that, as the original argument, much importance for this reason attaches to this language of words, signs and symbols, as a universal language. While in this language there may be errors of fact, of time, of numbers, of place, and of general statement, these are not regarded as important as the maintaining, as far as possible intact, the language as a whole for the great purpose it is designed to subserve. This on the one hand, while, on the other, there can be no doubt that were this language to be constructed in a far more satisfactory manner, and be in every way better done, by as much as the better knowledge of the circumstances and events and persons worked up in the same, and the greater freedom of thought possessed by, and greater liberality of mind influencing those to whom its arrangement should be now entrusted, would warrant.

In conclusion I may be permitted to express the opinion that, in their earnest efforts to expunge from the Masonic lodge ritual its Christian affinities, I do not believe that either brother Norton, brother Solomons, or any other brother Mason in America, will succeed until the number of Christian Masons in this country shall become the minority; for notwithstanding the more liberal language introduced and changes made by Dr. Anderson, of 1720 and subsequent time, Dr. Desaguliers, and others since, for the purpose of rendering the ceremonies and ritual of Freemasonry inoffensive in every country wherein it is known it will be noticed that this order partakes largely of the general characteristics, and is greatly subservient to the dormant form of religious belief of the people of such country, be that form what it may, and herein, in my opinion, lie the genius, the greatest strength and importance of Freemasonry, as a humanizing agency.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JAN. 28, 1875.

SOUND SENSE.

The following just and sensible letter from Prof. Wright, of the Telescope, is its own explanation. Some United Brethren, in their love and zeal for their church, expressed concern lest the Cynosure should be taken by some of their members to the neglect of the Telescope. Prof. Wright, on the contrary, sees that if the Telescope should be left to encounter the lodges alone and single-handed, without the aid and shelter of a National Association and its organ, those very brethren who love their church organization first and its truth and testimonies afterward, would flinch and flee in the conflict, and the Telescope must give up the law against the secret idolatries or go down. His argument drawn from the slavery struggle is unanswerable. If there had been no national movement against slavery, no one church could have held out against it without losing the conservative wing of its members, who would have regarded their anti-slavery leaders as fanatics. Let us stand shoulder to shoulder in this war.

We hope, too, Prof. Wright's suggestions about the Pittsburgh Anniversary will be heeded and acted on promptly. Read and ponder the letter:

DAYTON, O., Jan. 19, 1875.

Pres. J. Blanchard, Wheaton, Ill.:

DEAR BROTHER:—In the great Anti-secrecy conflict the Christian Cynosure is an indispensable instrumentality. It is a gun that many a friend, or apologist of secret societies, would fain dismount from its place in the fortress of reform, or at least spike it. May God put it into the hearts of anti-secrecy men and women to sustain it abundantly. Without it the United Brethren church would be, on the secrecy question, just about where they would have been on the slavery question without any paper making the slavery question a specialty. We then had such a paper in the Cincinnati Herald and Philanthrophist, afterward the National Era, as we now have in the Christian Cynosure. May the Cynosure grow in stature and in favor with God and man as the great anti-slavery organ did.

I hope every effort will be made to make the gathering at Pittsburgh an exponent of the growth of the anti-secrecy element in this country. I was at Pittsburgh at the first National Convention there, and desire, if practicable, to be at this. Yours in Christ,

MILTON WRIGHT.

SATAN'S CHEF D'OEUVRE.

"The Beecher business" as the press calls it, seems a very master-piece of evil.

By "shunning to declare" the whole counsel of God against popular errors and sins; by satirizing serious ministers as vinegar-vizaged; by deriding doctrines unacceptable to the carnal heart; aided by brilliancy of genius, and, perhaps exalted by inspiration from the "god of this world," he has attained a success which has turned the heads of multitudes of ambitious young ministers as a high lottery prize turns the head of men greedy of gain. Churches, called "Plymouth," after his, have sprung up, and dotted the surface of the United States. When the Cynosure first began to warn the churches against his methods, we offended a multitude of his admirers. Now similar multitudes are devouring, rather than reading, the details of his adultery-trial, sure to be polluted by it, whatever they believe or disbelieve about his guilt. And many make themselves merry over what seem to others the proofs of his crime. It resembles that deluge which the Dragon, it is said in the Apocalypse, cast out of his mouth to drown the Christian religion! Let us pray God that the earth may open her mouth and swallow up this dragon-flood. Let us read as little of the stuff as is consistent with forming an intelligent opinion, and let us "Serve God continually day and night."

STATE MEETINGS.

A note was received from Bro. Rayner Pennsylvania State Agent, after our last issue was printed, stating that the quarterly meeting of the State Convention was deferred from last week to Tuesday and Wednesday of the present. No report from that meeting can therefore be expected until next number. The brethren in charge are tried and faithful and know how to make a successful meeting, so that although the General Agent, who had hoped to be with them, is not present, we all expect a good report from the Keystone State.

In Wisconsin, though the workers are few and scattered, yet they have great hearts and great hopes for the meeting at Delevan, announced for the 16th of February. Beside other workmen they hope for some help from Bro. Stoddard who writes of coming hitherward during the early part of February.

The honest hard work laid out in Ohio will surely produce its effect in the pending State Convention at Mansfield, February 17th and 18th; and the strong corps of speakers engaged promises an unusually profitable meeting. Let the friends of Ohio and Wisconsin rally to these conventions with a will.

Friends in Michigan suggest several points for a State meeting. Prof. Rideout writes in the midst of arduous labors connected with the re-building of Hillsdale College, that Detroit, Grand Rapids or Jackson are convenient railroad centers and each have a daily press, which is of great advantage to a convention. Bro. R. Faurot, of Du Plain, is in favor of a State Convention and Lansing as the place, the time to be arranged. Rev. L. E. Jesseph, pastor of the Cooperville Wesleyan church, thinks Grand Rapids a good point. Rev. A. H. Springstein, of Ypsilanti, writes:

"I write to say that I am heartily in favor of the proposed convention. We are not doing our whole duty in Michigan. The people are fearfully in the dark on some of these questions. Very many, however, are loudly calling for light. I have received many urgent calls to lecture in various parts of the State, but so exacting has been my home work that I could not respond to any of those calls. I must try and find time to lecture some. But if there should be a call for a convention in Michigan, I will do all I possibly can to render it successful. By all means let us have the convention."

Of all the places suggested Jackson and Lansing are most central, though all have good railroad facilities. There must be this said of them all, however, there is no known local element which can be relied on to arrange for and sustain a successful meeting. If there can be any arrangement by which this can be attained a great part of the work is done. As has been mentioned once before, the engagements of the General Agent are probably such that a great part of the preliminary work must be undertaken by self-denying, zealous brethern on the ground. The same is true in Iowa, from whence few responses have been received during the past week.

Friends must not be discouraged at the steepness of the Hill Difficulty nor the lions in the way. The greater the obstacles the greater the victory when they are overcome, and the lions will always be found chained by the courageous soul. And remember "This is the victory that overcometh the world, even your faith." Keep writing, brethren, to each other and to the central office, and the Lord will open "a great door and effectual for his truth."

THE REFORMER AND FREE PRESS.—This united paper came to us a week or two ago and should have received an earlier notice, but the number was mislaid. It is a union of the Methodist Free Press, of Rockford, and the Reformer, of Sycamore, Ill., from which office the united print is hereafter to issue weekly at one dollar ten cents in advance. Letters addressed as above to the Arnold Brothers will recive attention. These young men have made a stand against the lodge which is worthy of all praise, and have established for themselves the leading printing office in De Kalb county, Ill., in the face of opposition at once vindicative, rancorous, savage and unscrupulous. They deserve richly the success they have gained.

SHERIDAN'S BANDITTI.—As a bandit is a proclaimed outlaw, the White Leagues of the South need only Grant's proclamation of the fact, to become such. They are secret armed bands like the brigands of the Mediterranean, seeking by terrorism and blood, not the public weal, but the advantage of their clans.

A New and Valuable Book.

"ODD-FELLOWSHIP, Its Doctrine and Practice Examined in the Light of God's Word and Judged by its own Utterances." By Rev. J. H. Brockmann, Ev. Lutheran pastor of Watertown, (late of Fort Atkinson). Wis. This work was originally written in German, and the careful preparation and thorough argument on the case are warrant enough for the labor of the translation to English by which its usefulness may be doubled. He quotes from Neidner, as saying in his Church History that "the influence of the Freemason lodges upon state and religion, has been greater than the majority of the members have known and their opponents have supposed." He also gives Dr. Hengstenberg's words in his book on "Freemasonry and the Evangelical Pastoral Office," wherein he says, "No small part of the blame rests upon the church and her theology, which hitherto have cared too little about penetrating into the nature of the order, or portraying the same in a clear and convincing manner, and proving its incompatiability with the Word of God." In the form of a dialogue the author takes up the various features and claims of Odd-fellowship analyzing them in a thorough manner and proving clearly the falseness and anti-Christian nature of the order. This is done in a kind, firm and earnest manner. The appendix forms one-third of the volume and contains sketches of the antiquity, government, secrets, ceremonies, and work of the order. We shall refer to this valuable work again. Any wishing the book may order through our Publishers who will probably have it on sale soon.

NOTES.

—The poetical tribute to Gerrit Smith in our last number should have been credited to the American Wesleyan where it appeared over the signature of Dwight Williams.

—Bishop Weaver, of Dayton, and Dr. R. B. Taylor, of Summerfield, have consented to speak at the Ohio State meeting at Mansfield, Feb. 17th and 18th. This promises to be a great meeting. Let every local organization and testifying church be represented.

—S. D. Greene, author of the Broken Seal, has been recently quite sick from a threatened attack of pneumonia. He is, however recovered, and again ready to give battle to the secret foe whenever he may appear.

—The National Freemason, conducted by Albert G. Mackey at Washington city, has lately suspended, and the great savant of the lodge has taken a second place in the Voice of Masonry of this city, so long conducted by J. C. W. Bailey who is retired to a general agency. The Chicago Masons certainly need some imported stock to save their thin-blooded lodges.

—While in most of the cities visited by King Kalakaua he was introduced to such resorts as the theatre and the lodge, there is some satisfaction in his interview in Washington with Senator Washburn, of Mass., who, with Senator Buckingham of Conn., was appointed a committee by the American Board to present the address of its prudential committee. The King replied as follows:

"I am extremely gratified, Mr. Senator, to receive a communication from the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, a body which, under divine Providence, has been allowed to exert so vast and beneficient an influence upon my people. I hope to be able to visit the city of Boston, and while there I shall be happy to receive the members of the Board and those who are interested with them in the great work in which they are engaged, and to express to them personally my high appreciation of them and of their labors."

—The following printed invitation was issued by the Oriental Lodge of Chicago on the occasion of King Kalakaua's visit:

His majesty, King Kalakaua, having expressed a desire to witness the conferring of the third degree by the Oriental Lodge, a communication of the Lodge will be held for that purpose on Friday evening next, at their hall, No. 122 La Salle street. You are cordially invited to be present.

E. Powell, Master.

January 12, 1875.

The King was accompanied to the lodge by Ex-congressman Wentworth (Long John), Ex-mayor Morris (the celebrated Buck. Morris of the Camp Douglas conspiracy), and other parties. The hall was crowded and many were turned away. Past Grand Master Cregier figured largely as usual in the performance. The King attended a like ceremony in New York, and the New York Masons sent on word to the order here of their success suggesting the same performance. That is the way in which the King "expressed a desire" to see a lodge initiation. The Chicago Times says a special Masonic ceremony was performed in this wise:

On Thursday afternoon Dr. Jonathan J. French, past grand patriarch of the Order of the Red Cross of Roman Constantine and Prince of Jerusalem, went to the Grand Pacific, and had a quiet chat with the king's secretary, Lieut. Totten, in which he intimated to that gentleman that he had the power to confer the degrees of the higher walks of Masonry. After this interview, Dr. French made an appointment to meet the king in his private rooms that day, which appointment he kept, and there conferred the degrees of the Red Cross upon his majesty, with a view to his introducing them in the Sandwich islands. Thus the king will take back at least one more instrument for the advancement of his island subjects in civilization.

Executive Committee Notice.—A meeting of the Ex. Committee, N. C. A., will be held at 9½ A. M. Saturday, Feb. 6th, at the rooms of the Y. M. C. A., 148 Madison St. Chicago. Let there be a prompt and full attendance to attend to important business. By order of

The Chairman.

Dedication.

The dedicatory services of the First Wesleyan Methodist Church in the village of Brighton, Livingston Co., Mich., will commence (D. V.) at 11 o'clock on Saturday, Jan. 30, and continue over the Sabbath. The friends of our cause everywhere are cordially invited to attend. J. H. Canfield, Pastor.

The American Independent Monthly.—Dr. Walsh still continues to pour light on the dark lodges through the pages of his magazine. Among the articles for this month is the first of a series on the History of Freemasonry. $1.00 a year; Jno. T. Walsh, publisher, New Berne, N. C.

The Sanitarian.—The February number of this valuable health journal contains articles on building sites and their relation to health; on the influence of physical exercise on the various organs of the body; and on the causes and nature of diptheria and some facts in its history. Dr. Dana has an interesting paper on the Enigmas of Life. A. N. Bell, publisher, 234 Broadway, New York.

Hillsdale College.—This, the oldest Free-will Baptist college is recovering rapidly its visitation of fire in March last. A greater part of the buildings were destroyed at that time, causing a loss of some $50,000. The work of rebuilding has begun in a thorough manner and the friends of the institution have confidence in its future prosperity and glory, though the work now before them demands the aid of every friend of the institution. The catalogue shows a prosperous academica year, unchecked by the inconveniences of the fire.

Twilight.

If Rev. Mr. Talmage had spoken out plainly and said Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship, instead of "curious and secret arts," below, he could only have said what every body sees he meant. The reason why he did not was given by the editor of this paper in his speech at Aurora, Ill., when, speaking of the lodge, he said: "Brave men stand silent and timid men quail before it." The lodge dictates to the pulpit. But we are thankful for twilight. It heralds the day. Let us hope that our Cynosure may prove as ——Hesperus that led

The starry host, rode brightest and led in the dawn,"

The following is from Talmage's pen:

What folly is it to attempt to reconcile curious and secret arts with Christianity. Yet men say that the Church of Christ must have "charity" for these things. Christianity says to every dark system, "Come to the light. Let 'all men' see your wicked deeds." It has nothing but fire for the books of these systems of error and superstition. A converted man cannot remain in the practice of the curious arts. He will show his deeds and confess all about his secret arts.

The Gospel must be preached so that fear will fall upon men engaged in these things and cause them to come out to the light of day. This kind of preaching is a want of to-day. There are masses of books that ought to be burned before the public. The price of these books may be great, but they are worth nothing to the world, and are a curse to it. The smoke of their burning should curl skyward, and be the last vanishing blackness of their wickedness. Preaching that does not destroy any evil is not the kind the world ought to have. It may suit the "Church," but it will not save the world. Christianity has not come into the world to make friends with it, but to carry the sword, and, we add, the fire, against every wicked system and its advocates and literature.

Bonfires are a want of the age. If they could be kindled in every library of corrupt literature, what a cleansing the world would receive. If every minister of the world would so preach that fear would fall upon the practicers of the evil arts, we should see a mighty putting away of hellish tricks and a speedy burning of the old bewitching books that have been in the schools of Satan for years.

The Western Secretary of the Am. Missionary Association, Rev. James Powell, has just returned from a tour among the churches and schools at the South, and publishes to the churches a summary of his observations. He says:

The following are a few of the convictions forced on me by what I saw and heard:

1st, The Southern people as a whole are not favorable to public schools.

2d. Where they are, unjust discriminations are made against the freedmen.

3d. White teacher's of public schools are regarded as "white niggers," and are excluded from society.

4th. White churches are not willing to do missionary work among the blacks and have no fellowship for such as are willing.

5th. The colored people have almost entirely an ignorant ministry, and their worship is boisterous and disorderly.

7th. Vice in many forms is fearfully prevalent, and religion, as expounded by the colored preachers, has no condemnation to utter.

8th. The colored youth are not so eager to avail themselves of the benefits of education, nor are they so apt to make advancement as the sudden outburst of interest occasioned by emancipation had led us to expect.

In brief, ignorance, poverty, and moral degradation are painfully prominent characteristics of the condition of the colored and by far the larger part of the white population. . . .

It is vain to hope for a remedy either from Southern politics or Southern philanthrophy. Public sentiment is not sufficiently enlightened to support public schools adequately, and moral sentiment is not sufficiently strong to devise and prosecute missionary work. If from the North there do not go those religous and educational influences that have been the source of its greatnes, and are to-day the bulwarks of its defense, as well as the pledge of its future, well-nigh hopeless is the outlook for the Southern States.

The Association has 250 teachers and missionaries at the South instructing the people in the principles and practices of true Gospel religion. But the work is suffering greatly for lack of means. But about one-fourth of the Congregational churches in Mr. Powell's district contributed last year to this great and urgent cause. He appeals earnestly for aid, and must not ask in vain.

Winter.

Hail, monarch of the leafless crown!
Rare seen save with a gloomy frown,
With ice for sceptre, robes of snow.
Thy throne—the streams arrested flow—
Stern tyrant! whom the hast'ning sun
Doth loathe to serve, by vapors dun
Begirt, a melancholy train,
O'er nature holding saddest reign.
Lo! of thy rigor birds make plaint,
And all things 'neath thy burden faint,
Nor cheered are they by message cold,
In answer by the north wind told,
The envy of thy grevious sway,
When thou would-st drive all hope away
From nature, yearning to restore
To earth the bliss it knew before,
When summer ruled with empire mild,
And autumn, still a ruddy child,
Lay cradled 'mong the greenery
Of whisp'ring grove and laden tree.
The brook that prattled to the air
Of golden harvests, scenes as fair
As poet wrapt in fancy's maze
Could scarce enshrine in mortal lays,
Now rude and angry hurls along
The hearers of his summer song—
The branch and leaf that once repaid
His music with their tender shade,
And catching zephyr's honeyed tone,
To his sweet tuning joined their own.
Or bound, perchance, in durance slow,
Full faint he wends, and moaning low,
Fit dirge he makes o'er freedom lost
In joy of which he wanton tossed
The falling blossoms on his wave,
For water-nymphs to catch and save.
Now stript of his green bravery,
In piteous plight the weary tree
Is blown upon by mocking winds,
Whom changed now he sighing finds
From those gay playmates welcomed erst
In glee by his young leaves when first
They wove their merry breeze-taught dance,
And broke their feathered lodgers' trance,
What time the eastern wave did gleam
'Neath fore-feet of the golden team.
Not busy now with tender care
For coming brood the birds prepare
Their airy cradle, rocked unseen
By Dryad hands behind the screen
Of leafy curtains, where no eye
Of mischief curious may pry.
The thrush that erst with swelling voice
Made all the tangled brake rejoice
In echoes of his mellowed strain,
To mope in silence now is fain;
Nor ever pipes from straining throat
The varied wonders of his note.
So bleak the scene, so sad the day,
Too harsh, O Winter, is thy sway!

Chambers' Journal.

Leaving Home.

BY D. F. NEWTON.

"When forced to part from those we love,
Though sure to meet to-morrow:
We yet a kind of anguish prove,
And fell a touch of sorrow."

Parents, is a son or a daughter of yours about to give the parting hand, say, "farewell," and perhaps a long, long farewell! Farewell is a solemn word.

"Let what will line our onward way, Farewells a bitter word to say."

How is it father and mother? have you discharged your duties faithfully, God-fearingly, to these dear ones on the eve of departure from the paternal roof? Paul could say "I am pure from the blood of all men." (Acts. xx, 26) Can you say to this son and daughter now bidding adieu to your fond embrace, "Children, we are pure from the blood of your souls?" Sure 'tis when a child has gone forth from under the parental care, if the work is not done you cannot follow it or change it; there can be no remedy. There is no way of compensating for neglect to sow the seed at the proper time. The seed-sowing time is when your children are at home, in your family; and if you are going to do anything for them, you must do it then. Then take heed, time is flying. What you do for your children, do quickly, or it will be too late. You may be taken from them. If they are taken from you, thank God. Happy is that family that has cherubs in heaven. Blessed are they whose care and responsibility are ended because Christ hath taken their darlings. Better teachers than you are, are angels. A better parent than you are, is God. And blessed are those of your children that have gone to be with him. But what is done for those that yet remain with you, must be done speedily. Your days are ages in their effect, and yet they are fugitive as the arrow that flits through the air.

It has been said of John Williams' mother: "Little did she imagine, when her children were clustered around her knees, and listening to the words that fell from her lips, that she was training up one of the most influential missionaries of the cross, and that distant tribes and future generations would rise up and call her blessed.' A very similar testimony may be borne to thousands of other godly parents.

"Such a home makes man the better,—
Pure and lasting its control:
Home with pure and bright surroundings
Leaves its impress on the soul."

The Christian's Tongue.

The apostle James teaches that a man's religion is vain who does not bridle his tongue. In fact, he maintains very much at large through his epistle, that speech is the sign of character; that a man who is offenseless in this respect, is so in all respects, and is in fine, a perfect character. But it will be asked, Why does the apostle single out one virtue, and make all religious service vain which does not manifest itself in well-governed speech? The answer is, that speech is a man's most spiritual act. An uncontrolled and a conscienceless tongue is a sign of a soul conscienceless and uncontrolled. On the contrary, an offenseless tongue is evidence of perfectness in life. Think what self-control it argues to give a soft answer in place of a rough one, when unjust words, barbed and poisoned with insult, provoke on the instant. Think what it costs sometimes, when the answer is hot in the heart, to be still and say not a word. Think of Jesus standing before the maddening priests, and answering not a word; standing before a "whited wall," and not calling him so—a test which the impulsive and eloquent Peter could not stand, although he quickly recovered his self-consciousness, and was prompt to apologize with Christian humility. Self-control in speech is mastery of spirit, a better victory than his who taketh a city. How many conquerers there have been who never conquered this little member.—American Messenger.

Profanity.

Against common swearing, St. Chrysostom spends twenty discourses: and by the number and weight of arguments hath left this testimony, that it is a foolish vice, but hard to be cured; infinitely unreasonable, but strangely prevailing; almost as much without remedy as it is without pleasure; for it enters first by folly, and grows by custom, and dwells with carelessness, and is nursed by irreligion and want of the fear of God. It profanes the most holy things, mingles dirt with the beams of the sun,—follies and trifling talk interwoven and knit together with the sacred name of God. It placeth the most excellent of things in the meanest and basest circumstances; it brings the secrets of heaven into the streets, dead men's bones into the temple. Nothing is a greater sacrilege than to prostitute the great name of God to the petulancy of an idle tongue, and blend it as an expletive to fill up the emptiness of a weak discourse. The name of God is so sacred, so mighty, that it rends mountains, it opens the bowels of the deepest rocks, it casts out devils, and makes hell to tremble, and fills all the regions of heaven with joy. The name of God is our strength and confidence, the object of our worshipings, and the security of all our hopes; and when God had given himself a name, and immured it with dread and reverence, like the garden of Eden with the swords of cherubims, none durst speak of it but he whose lips were hallowed, and that at holy and solemn times, in a most holy and solemn place.—Jeremy Taylor.

The Sharpness of the Work.

Now, see what the laborer brings with him. It is a sickle. His communications with the corn are sharp and cutting. He cut right through, cuts the corn down, and casts it on the ground. The man whom God means to be a laborer in his harvest must not come with soft and delicate words, and flattering doctrines concerning the dignity of human nature and the excellence of self-help, and of earnest endeavors to rectify our lapsed condition, and the like. Such mealy-mouthedness may God curse, for it is the curse of this age! The honest preacher calls a sin a sin, and says to men, "You are ruining yourselves; while you reject Christ you are living on the borders of hell, and ere long you will be lost to all eternity. There shall be no mincing the matter, you must escape from the wrath to come by faith in Jesus, or be driven forever from God's presence, and from all hope of joy." The preacher must make his sermon cut. He is not to file off the edge of his scythe for fear it should hurt somebody. No, my hearers, we mean to hurt you; our sickle is made on purpose to cut. The Gospel is intended to wound the conscience, and to go right through the heart, with the design of separating the soul from sin and self, as the corn is divided from the soil. Our object is to cut the sinner right down, for all the comeliness of the flesh must be slain, all his glory, all his excellence must be withered, and the man must be as one dead ere he can be saved. Ministers who do not aim to cut deep are not worth their salt. God never sent the man who never troubles men's consciences. Such a man may be an ass treading down the corn, but a reaper he certainly is not.—Spurgeon.

Roman Catacombs.

The impression of the Catacombs, with their inscriptions and the vast numbers of human remains, multitudes of them lying just as they were laid by pious hands, is deep and irresistible. Here you literally walk among thousands, hundreds of thousands and, as Dr. Rossi advisedly says, "millions" of ancient believers, dating certainly from the year 71 A. D. to 410. These catacombs lie in a zone some two miles wide outside the city, and their latest and most careful investigator has hazarded the suggestion that the entire extent of their passages is as great as the length of all Italy. I visited four of them, besides the Jewish cemetery. In one of them I wandered around two miles by taper-light, though only one-eighth of its entire extent. It was a part of the Catacombs of St. Agnes, newly excavated. We passed through two series of galleries, one beneath the other, and looked down into the third. On each side were toombs into the rock above each other in from five to nine successive tiers (according to the hight of the passage) and each tier joined by the next throughout the whole distance, with scarcely a vacant foot between. Many of the tablets still remained undisturbed in front, with the trustful inscription of Christian "peace" rudely cut or sometimes merely scratched in mortar with the point of a trowel. But most of them were opened; and the remains, often entire skeletons, frequently two or even more in a single tomb, were lying precisely as they lay ages ago. In that three-quarters of an hour I passed the remains probably of ten thousand persons, and was reminded freshly of the statements of Tacitus and the boast of Tertulllian.

It is impossible to convey the impression of the nearness, vividness, and the absolute certainty of the great events of early Christianity made upon one who walks among these miles and miles of Christian dead, and these thousands of ancient original and separate records. Many inscriptions have been removed to the more convenient galleries of the Vatican and Lateran palaces. They are in general, rudely, often hastily and clumsily cut or scratched, frequently in unclassical Latin or Greek of those times; but they all record that they are "in peace," or that they "rest," while the cross, the olive branch, the dove, the victor's palm symbolize their faith and hopes. A man who walks round among this vast cloud of early witnesses who have here individually proclaimed their faith, often from the martyr's tomb, is constrained to feel that the evidence of anything else in all the mighty life of ancient Rome is almost insignificant in comparison.

And they not only tell the fact, but the nature of their faith. Nothing shines out so as the brightness of that hope in contrast with the darkness of the pagan death, or even the Jewish burial. I visited the Hebrew Catacombs marked with Jewish symbols, and two of the old Roman columbaria, containing the ashes of some thousand persons, and I have spent many hours in examining the inscriptions gathered in the Vatican and Lateran palaces from the pagan and the Christian burial places. And the difference is simply marvelous. The pagan inscriptions are often pompous records of rank and title, and in many instances they are full of yearning expressions of endearment for "a beloved son," a "sweetest daughter," a "dearest husband," or even "an incomparable wife;" but I have searched in vain through hundreds of inscriptions for one expression of any hope beyond. One young wife "lies in darkness." A desparing mother sees in the death of her two children "her own funeral." A young daughter comforts her parents because her early death was "fated." But commonly all comment is sadly wanting. In the Jewish tombs I saw in two places only the utterances "In peace" and "sleeping." But this was the universal Christian song: They were in peace, resting, sleeping, in Christ, in God. The comfort of the survivor also expresses itself not seldom in touching forms. The memorial is made to the "dearest and most blessed wife," or "to the most loving and noble wife by her most happy husband."

But the details of these interesting records open a field too wide to enter upon now. One or two points call for a moment's notice. The first is the absolute Christian equality here indicated. There are no records of human honor or estimation though sometimes a simple indication of a church officer. But even here the men whom the Romish church calls "popes" are simply termed "episcopus," or pastor. And, while the pagan inscriptions are full of illusions to "slaves" and freedmen," it is a singular fact that 11,000 Christian inscriptions do not contain more than six or seven such illusions.

Another noteworthy historic fact is the view which these Christians held concerning their infant children. I have copied numerous inscriptions upon children, from three years old down to two and one, in which the same phrases and symbols are employed as in the case of adult Christians. Thus: "Alexander in peace, who lived one year and twelve days." Another, a little girl who lived one year and fifteen days is "in peace," and beneath is the dove with the olive branch in its mouth. Just so in numerous other cases. Some light is cast upon other views they held as when Christ is termed God; but these things are too meagre, and frequently the exact date too uncertain to give them special importance. And it would be an interesting task to unfold more fully the wealth of faith and hope that is embodied in these rude and simple "annals of the poor." But my chief purpose now has been to indicate, however imperfectly, the tremendous force of testimony contained in the ancient city of Rome to the power and veritable character of the Christianity which sprung up there almost immediately after the death of our Lord.—Prof. Bartlett.

"Work while the day lasts."

Traveling in Bradford County, Pa.

Our space requires brevity. But we we must say that the mountains have been hurled together in the wildest confusion. The short train for ten or fifteen miles was almost constantly on a curve, and sometimes on two at once like the letter S. At several points the head of the train curved around out of sight, and the grade was so heavy that the steel hoofs of our iron horse frequently slipped in his path. Dense forests covered the sides of the mountain, except in places far above the tall trees, well on toward a thousand feet, and perhaps more, the grey granit of the perpendicular rocks lifted their hoary heads.

At length the "Foot of the Plane" was reached, and we left our train to be drawn up to the coal mines by cables and a stationary engine, while we took a "skeleton" wagon, driven by young brother Oliver Faucett, and climbed six miles up the mountains to his father's house. Three miles was through a wild forest, without a human habitation, where not one rod of the road was even. The only regular and uniform objects we saw on the route were the trees of the dense woods, straight as a sperm candle and a hundred feet high. Up, up we clambered, turning right and left around boulders and "cradle-knolls," and preparing us for the good dinner awaiting us. . . .

On the return, brother Clark brought us ten miles over the snow-covered mountains, down to the Du-Shore train at New Albany. The engine and the coal train came soon and passed. Presently the detached passenger coaches came in sight around a distant curve. They were stopped by the brakemen, at our station. "All aboard" and the brakes were loosed, when the cars moved on, pursuing a train of which they were a portion, but which was at times whistling for another station before we left the last. For sixteen miles we swept around the numberless curves of this old "coal road," propelled only by the power of gravity. We are of the opinion that it not only appeared perilous to run at such a fearful rate around sharp curves and over yawning chasms, upon splintered rails and a rough road-bed, but we believe it was perilous.

We stood by the brakeman on the front platform when we were sweeping like an eagle around and down the mountain's brow, and suggested, "We are going rather fast, are we not?" He looked askance—saw our hair sticking out straight, and loosened up the brakes a little. Fearing that he had misunderstood, we spoke again—"Is not this a break-neck rate of speed?" He saw he was doing it, and he loosened up the brakes a little more, and our hat shoved itself up to blow off, when we saw he was operated by contraries, so we said, "Loose the breaks, and let her drive." Zip, went the brakes as he swung on the break-wheel and we slackened down to a fair rate of speed. We thought of the lady in California on a six-horse-coach, who on descending a narrow mountain road, asked, "Driver, where shall we go if that brake gives out?" He coolly replied, "That depends on how you have lived in this world."

The scenery did not impress us so deeply as upon the road we ascended. And yet it was exceedingly romantic and wild. The nameless, and expressionless sensations one feels in the presence of these silent witnesses of the past and whose tongues are dumb to our thousand queries, in no way relieves the wonder of the soul. Art has drawn its lines along these mountain fastnesses, and made but the slightest impressions, for still,

"The old, old rocks, with furrowed faces,
Spring up like ghosts in their lonely places."

These mighty heroes of the geologic ages have been seemingly stationed to guard the approaches leading to the treasures which are hidden away up these tortuous pathways, behind the fortresses and battlements which nothing but a strong force and a seige can take. God knows how to do his work the best.—Am. Wesleyan.

Child and Mother.

Love thy mother, little one!
Kiss and clasp her neck again!
Hereafter she may have a son
Will kiss and clasp her neck in vain—
Love thy mother, little one!

Gaze upon her living eyes,
And mirror back her love for thee!
Hereafter thou may'st shudder sighs
To meet them when they cannot see—
Gaze upon her living eyes!

Press her lips the while they glow
With love that they have often told!
Hereafter thou may'st press in woe,
And kiss them till thine own are cold—
Press her lips the while they glow!

Oh, revere her raven hair,
Although it be not silvery-gray!
Too early, death, led on by care,
May snatch save one dear lock away—
Oh, revere her raven hair!

Pray for her at eve and morn,
That heaven may long the stroke defer;
For thou may'st live the hour forlorn,
When thou wilt ask to die with her—
Pray for her at eve and morn!

A Persian Story.

Jesus, says a Persian story, arrived at a certain city, and sent his disciples forward to prepare a supper, while he himself, intent on doing good, walked through the streets, into the market place. And he saw, at the corner of the market, some people gathered together, looking at an object on the ground, and he drew near to see what it might be. It was a dead dog, with a halter around his neck, by which he appeared to have been dragged through the dirt, and a more vile, a more abject, a more unclean thing never met the eye of man. And those who stood by and looked on with abhorrence. "Faugh!" said one, stopping his nose, "it pollutes the air." "How long shall the foul beast offend our sight?" said another. "Look at his torn hide," said a third; "one could not even cut a shoe out of it." "And his ears," said a fourth, "all dragged and bleeding." "No doubt," says a fifth, "he has been hanged for stealing." And Jesus heard them, and looking down on the dead creature, he said, "Pearls are not equal to the whiteness of his teeth." And then the people turned upon him with amazement, and said among themselves, "Who is this?" "This must be Jesus of Nazareth, for only he could find something to pity and approve, even in a dead dog;" and, being ashamed, they bowed their heads before him, and each went his way.

A Little Talk to the Girls and Boys.

It is very hard for boys and girls between 10 and 20 to believe what older people tell them concerning the selection of reading matter. If a book is interesting, exciting, thrilling, the young folks want to read it. They like to feel their hair stand on end at the hairbreadth escapes of the hero, and their nerves tingle to the ends of their fingers at his exploits, and their faces burn with passionate sympathy in his tribulations—and what harm is there in it? Let us see what harm there may be. You know very well that a child fed on candy and cake and sweetmeats soon loses all healthy appetite for nutritious food, his teeth grow black and crumble away, his stomach becomes deranged, his breath offensive, and the whole physical and mental organization is dwarfed and injured. When he grows older he will crave spices and tobacco and alcohol to stimulate his abnormal appetite and give pungency to tasteless though healthful food. No man who grows up from such childhood is going to have the first positions of honor and trust and usefulness in the community where he lives. The men who hold those positions were fed with milk and bread and meat when they were young and not with trash.

Now, the mind like the body grows by what it feeds upon. The girl who fills her brain with silly, sentimental, love-sick stories grows up into a silly, sentimental, lackadaisical woman, useless for all the noble and substantial work of life. The boy who feeds on sensational newspapers and exciting novels has no intellectual muscle, no commanding will to make his way in the world. Then, aside from the debilitating effect of such reading, the mind is poisoned by impure associations. These thrilling stories have always murder or theft, or lying or knavery, as an integral part of their tissue, and boys while reading them live in the companionship of men and women, of boys and girls with whom they would be ashamed to be seen conversing, whom they would never think of inviting to their houses and introducing to their friends, and whose very names they would not mention in polite society as associates and equals. Every book that one reads, no less than every dinner that one eats, becomes part and parcel of the individual, and we can no more read without injury an unwholesome book or periodical than we can eat tainted meat and not suffer thereby. Just as there are everywhere stores full of candy and cake, and liquor and tobacco and spices, so there are everywhere books, newspers, and magazines full of the veriest trash, and abounding in everything boys and girls should not read. And just as the healthful stomach, passing all these pernicious baits, will choose sound aliment, so the healthful mind will reject the unwholesome literature current everywhere, and select only such as is intrinsically good.

The other day we picked up a popular juvenile weekly, and presently found ourself knee-deep in slang, over our head in vulgar allusion and in the midst of a low-lived metropolitan crowd, where cock-fights, dog-fights, and man-fights were the condiments offered to whet the appetite for reading, and yet we know families where that paper is regularly taken. Do the parents read it? Do they know what company their children are keeping?

But, says the young inquirer, What shall we read and how shall we know if books are suitable? Read such books as give you valuable information, histories, travels, and those works of fiction that are approved by people of correct judgement. Our leading magazines contain a vast amount of reading, interesting alike to young and old. Do not read what renders distasteful the ordinary duties of life, or renders vice attractive, or makes you long for an impossible and romantic career.—N. Y. Tribune.

Religious Intelligence.

—The United Presbyterian Mission Board expects to send two new missionaries to Egypt during the month of February.

—As the first fruits of the late revival in Nashua, N. H., 337 members were received into the different churches on Sunday, Jan. 10th.

—The ten Presbyterian churches of Indianapolis have received an average increase of membership during the past year, of sixty, or a total of six hundred.

—The English revisers of the Old Testament completed their twenty-seventh session, December 18th. The revision of the books of Samuel was completed, and the company took up Isaiah, reaching verse 20 of chapter 1.

—The new University building in Ottawa, Kansas, was entirely destroyed on Wednesday evening, the 13th, involving a loss of $60,000, upon which there was no insurance. It was built by the Baptists, and was to have been inaugurated next spring.

—A religious paper states that there are eighty-seven Protestant missionaries now working in Japan, nearly all from America.

—Revivals are reported in many of the churches throughout the Northwest, the largest number being reported in Methodist churches, the Baptists, Presbyterians, and Congregationalists following.

—The Sunday Magazine for December contains a sketch of Charlotte Elliott, author of the popular religious hymn, beginning "Just as I am," etc. She was the daughter of Charles Elliott, of Clapham, and grandfather of the Rev. Henry Venn. She was an invalid from 1829 to the time of her death, about two or three years ago. A volume of extracts from her letters, journals, and poems has just been issued by the Religious Tract Society of London.

—Prof. Schaff, at a private reception given to the Bible-Revision Committee in New York, recently, stated that the object of the revisers was not to make a new translation or version of the English Bible, but, retaining the present language, to remove obsolete words, correct inaccuracies, render proper names uniform, and make such improvements as are demanded by the scholarship of the age. The work of the English revisers is sent to the United States, where it is again revised and sent back with suggestions; these, if agreed upon, are adopted; if not, a committee of conference is appointed. Four years have been spent in England in the revision and two in this country; and, at the present rate of work, Dr. Schaff estimates that it will take six or seven years more to completed it.

—A continuous prayer-meeting was held from 10 to 4 o'clock last week Wednesday in the Union Park Cong. Church, conducted by the Chicago ministerial Union. Pastors Bain, Bushnell, Duffield, Cheney and others took part, and Major Whittle, the evangelist, spoke deeply and fervently on the subject of consecration. His theme was, that people were sent into this world to serve the Lord Jesus Christ by crucifying their own tastes and desires, and only thus could they become acceptable to God. The brother made a wholesome application to the temptation and spiritual death lurking in the theater, the ball-room and popular party. By the blessing of God such words will be of great profit to souls unused to such plain preaching.

—An abusive personal attack was made on Messrs. Moody and Sankey by one of the leading actors in a Manchester theater a month since which ended in his being hissed ingloriously from the stage.

—The Chicago Tribune says of the revival in Great Britain: "Messrs. Moody and Sankey are attracting wide attention by their revival meetings in Great Britain. The interest in these meetings, though continued for many months, and in various cities of Scotland, Ireland, and England, seems rather to increase than otherwise. In Dublin, as many as 20,000 persons are reported to have been present. These men are now in Manchester, England, where, the reporter says, the revival work, in its full force, has followed them. They remain in that city until Feb. 1st, when they open the campaign in Liverpool. In the latter city a temporary building is in process of erection for the evangelists, capable of holding 7,000 persons. Their programme is to remain in Liverpool one month, and to begin work in London about March 1st. Arrangements are making to hold forty meetings simultaneously, in London, and it is said that $50,000 have already been subscribed to carry on the work in the metropolis. Mr. Moody has sent to the United States for several persons to help him in his work in London. Among these were Messrs. Whittle and Bliss, of this city, who received a note last week asking them to come over in March to the great London revival meeting. It is not known whether they will go. At the conclusion of the London meeting Mr. Moody expects to return to Chicago."

News of the Week.

The City.

The failure of Cook County Bank has caused a sensation among business circles during the past week. Although its annual report showed a fair statement, the concern has been speculating wildly, and has for some time been watched by the other banks of the city. Iowa banks will be heaviest losers.——The election ordered by Gov. Beveredge to fill the unexpired term of J. B. Rice, deceased, passed without any noticable feature except the efforts of a certain horse-jockey to get votes of his set. Caulfield, Congressman elect from the district, is probably chosen to fill the vacancy.

Senatorial Elections.

After occupying a seat in the Senate 18 years, Chandler of Michigan has at length been outvoted. Judge Christiancy takes his place.—Representative Dawes was elected last week by the Massachusetts Legislature to the seat in the Senate long held by Sumner. ——Cottrell, Democrat, succeeds Schurz from Missouri.——Ex-President Andrew Johnson is candidate for election in Tennesee, with a probability of success, though the voting has been long and close.——Another contest of several days duration is going on in the Wisconsin Legislature. Carpenter is renominated for the Senate but is not likely to gain the election. His personal habits will hardly bear endorsement.

The Country.

The managers of the Northwestern and the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroads are petitioning the Wis. Legislature with a view to securing a modification of the Potter law, which is operating ruinously. The earnings of the Northwestern have decreased 25 per cent in Wisconsin. The St. Paul have suffered even more, and the most of the minor roads have defaulted in their December interest and will be in the hands of the receivers. It is said that Governor Taylor and the Railroad Commissioners are in favor of amending the law.——On Friday evening last, just after dark, as three negros with their wagons loaded with shingles had gone into camp about six miles from Clinton, La., they were visited by white men, who were mounted, and who proposed buying their shingles, when, after a few words, one of the white men pulled out a pistol and shot two or three of the negros, killing them instantly.——The report of the Reservoir Commission of Massachusetts, shows that no less than twenty-seven unsafe reservoirs and dams exist in the State and that the loss by breaking away of these structures last year foots up $1,250,000 in Hampshire county, and $48,000 in Hamden. The Boston and Albany Railroad lost $100,000, and the New Haven and Northampton, $25,000.——Col. Remick, special agent of the Nebraska Aid society, reports 3,000 horses and 1,000 oxen in the grasshopper district suffering for food and liable to perish unless grain is supplied them. The officers of the Society have applied to Henry Bergh, President of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, for aid to save them and enable farmers to work their land next spring.——Some 300 miners are reported at work in the Black Hills and a detachment of troops have been sent to drive them away, but the severe cold weather compelled them to go into camp.——A snow-slide in the mountains near Genoa, Nev., buried forty Chinamen wood-cutters, and twenty-eight were killed.——Many lives have also been lost in the Utah mining camps from snow slides during the past week.

Foreign.

The Carlist General Palacios has petitioned for amnesty. Forty-seven Carlist officers are said to have notified the Spanish Consul in Bayonne that they have given in their adhesion to King Alfonso. It is reported that the Carlists are now enrolling youths of seventeen years in their service.—— The Prussion authorities have closed the Roman Catholic Seminary at Fulda, expelled the head priest from German territory, and sequestrated all the property of the Bishop of that diocese. The Bishop of Paderborn, whose term of imprisonment expires to-day, will probably be immediately confined in the fortress of Wesel.——Hon. W. E. Foster has been generally spoken of as successor of Mr. Gladstone, as leader of the Liberal party in England. Late letters say however that a meeting of the party called for Feb. 4th, there will be a cordial recognition of Lord Granville as the head of the party. The London News says there is little doubt that the meeting will elect the Marquis of Hartington to the leadership in the House of Commons.

Farm and Garden.

Application of Manure in Winter.

Last spring for the first time I heard a good deal about the spreading of fresh manure in the winter. I had always been bred in the notion that we ought to be very careful how we handled our fresh manure, that we ought to keep it as close as possible, plow it in, cover it in some way, and not expose it to the air. I had not much of it; I was a little choice of it. It was quite necessary for me to save what I had. But I think the tendency of men's minds is to think that they ought to plow in manure quite green and fresh, and I have seen very much of it done. I commenced in the early part of the winter and carted out what I had—perhaps one hundred bushels that was not more than three or four weeks old. It was quite fresh, (we had kept it in the barn cellar trodden by pigs). Five or six weeks later we carted out more, and we kept on in that routine. It was on a meadow. We had occasionally spells when the ground was entirely bare that winter, and there were drying winds. In looking at that meadow this spring I had supposed I should find certain strips where I had applied the manure, upon which I should never see much effect produced by it. I had marks, so that I could tell distinctly where each lot of manure was applied, and I also had a record of the dates on which each lot was spread and the circumstances. There was a good deal of sand in this manure. I marked particularly one strip where the land had lain a fortnight without any covering whatever. It lay right alongside of a strip that was covered with snow the next day after the manure was applied to it. I could see no sign there of a difference in the growth of the grass; I could see no difference between that which had been exposed to those drying winds and that which had been immediately covered with heavy snow that afterward melted, and washed and soaked the manure into the ground. We have had a very wet season this year. I have been so much encouraged with the result of this experiment that I shall try it again.—Hartford Courant.

CHICKEN CHOLERA.—This is not an intestinal, but a blood disease, caused by cold, damp, uncleanness, a lack of ventilation, improper food or drink, a want of water, or anything else that interferes with digestion or nutrition. It spreads rapidly through a flock, probably for the reason that fowls are rather unclean feeders, and the evacuations of sick members of the flock, which are the means of infection, drop into the feed or water, and some portion finds its way into the stomachs of the well ones. None of our domestic animals are hardier than poultry when sanitary rules are maintained, and none so soon succumb to disease when they are neglected. To cure cholera try giving at night a few pills of bread soaked in castor oil, followed the next morning by others mixed with a small pinch of copperas, an equal quantity of black pepper, and sufficient Castile soap to hold them together. Repeat these last once a day for a week. A model, healthful poultry household should be kept as clean as a model farm kitchen. There will be no cholera then.—N. Y. Tribune.

For Choked Cattle.—A remedy, which has never failed when tried, is a teacupful of soft soap dissolved in a pint or a little more of warm water, and poured down the throat of the choked animal. As soon as administered, the apple or potato is instantly thrown up upon passing the hand along the throat.

Home and Health Hints.

New Mode of Treating Dyspepsia.—Dr. Dio Lewis informs us that some years ago a physician in New York city published a small book in which he gave written certificates of marvelous cures of dyspepsia. His cures were mysterious and very effective. He charged $500 for a cure, and his patients were most solemnly pledged, with much ceremony, to profound secrecy as to the mode of treatment. After the death of the doctor, some of the patients felt themselves absolved from the obligation of secrecy, and one of them disclosed the facts in the case to Dr. Lewis. After correcting some of the more grossly wrong dietetic habits, the doctor required each patient to spend ten or fifteen minutes in the morning, at rising, in kneading and slapping his own abdomen with precision. This was to extend over the stomach, bowels and the liver. This was repeated just before dinner; again, at 7 P. M., with precision on going to bed. The patient was requested to be temperate and regular in all his habits, exercise much in the open air, and attend assiduously to the slapping, kneading and percussion of the whole abdomen; and as the result, we are informed that malignant cases of indigestion, that had resisted all other remedies yielded to this.

It is marvelous how a stomach, sore and sensitive at first, and hardly able to bear a touch, will strengthen under these operations, and bear, in a short time, with pleasure, pretty rough handling. I have experienced the benefit of these manipulations, and can testify to their great utility. Under this treatment a torpid liver will be aroused to activity, constipated bowels will become regular and do their normal work, and a sluggish stomach will put on its wonted energy.—Watchman and Reflector.

To Roast a Goose.—Let the bird be about eight months old, and killed at least twenty-four hours before it is cooked. The fatter it is the better. Remove every pin feather, singe carefully, draw and take away everything not eatable from the neck and body. All the loose fat should be removed and tried out by itself. Take the neck, middle joint of the wings, liver, heart, and gizzard, and stew them together gently for several hours. They will make a nice pie. For the stuffing take two large onions chopped fine, a teaspoonful of pulverized sage, a teaspoonful of black pepper, and two teaspoonfuls of salt, adding a little crumbled bread. Goose is strong food, and requires strong dressing. When the body of the bird is stuffed, close the opening to keep the steam in and the fat out. Put butter or a slice of fat pork on the breast when the goose is put in the oven, but do not put any water in the dripping-pan. Bake two hours, basting every 20 or 30 minutes with the fat in the pan. When the goose is done remove from the pan, pour off the fat and set it away, add to the brown gravy in the pan the gravy from the giblets, bring the whole to a boil and serve. Apple sauce and onion sauce are proper accompaniments to roast goose.

Temperance.

Blind Eyes Pulled Open.

The Excise Commissioners of Brooklyn used to be unable to see any violation of the law against Sunday liquor-selling. To be sure, the doors of the shops were entered on Sundays by men accustomed to drink there on other days. To be sure, these men went in sober and came out drunk. To be sure, many witnesses testified that these men drank something, presumably intoxicating liquor. But because the witnesses could not swear that they had themselves tasted and tested the beverage producing drunkenness, the Commissioners were inclined to think the illicit traffic not proven. But the agitations of the past year have opened their eyes. They have been obliged by public sentiment to admit reasonable evidence.

In some of our large towns there are very many Christian people who do not see that intoxication is alarmingly prevalent. They are living in the same block with drunkards and rum-sellers. They are obliged to ride in cars and omnibuses where the air is thick with whiskey fumes, and where peaceful passengers are insulted. They are obliged to support prisons, police, and poor-houses at enormous expense, to be filled with victims of strong drink. But because they do not see the tippler standing at the bar, swallowing liquor; because they do not personally witness the lower forms of this degradation which is destroying the lives and homes of their neighbors, they cannot be convinced that intemperance is doing widespread harm. Now, whatever may be said in criticism of the various ways that are taken to combat the liquor-traffic, this much is clear: that any way and all ways that tend to rouse attention and open blind eyes to the enormi- and spread of drunkenness are so far tybeneficial. We cannot be thoroughly or permanently successful until good people are united in fighting the liquor traffic, and that union will never come until all can be made to see its effects. This opening of eyes must be accomplished by persistent exposure of the evils produced, and by the pressure of of public sentiment. I think the reason that many are not moved by ordinary appeals is that they do not really believe that the evil is so great, and they are too selfishly indolent to make thorough inquiry. The truth has to be driven into men's minds sometimes, and eyes have to be opened by sheer pulling, as in the case of the Excise Commissioners.—Working Church.

MASONRY A WORK OF DARKNESS.

A SERMON BY

REV. LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG.

"It will have a tendency to render me infamous or disgraced. It will furnish evidence against me in an indictment for murder."

From their own admission, then, the proof is incontestible, that Masons did put William Morgan to death. By considering the Masonic obligations paramount to the civil oath, and by suffering the penalty of the latter for contumacy of its authority; rather than incur the penalty of the Masonic law, which would cut their throat and smite off their skull, they have proved the very facts which we now positively and fearlessly affirm, that Masons did put William Morgan to death, in the execution of the penalty of Masonic obligation, for requirements of Freemasonry. They are positive witnesses against themselves, both by their admissions, and obstinate refusal to testify on the case, that they, and all others who have equivocated or refused to testify, (and the Lord knows how many more), were either perpetrators of the horrid deed of taking the life of William Morgan, or were accessories to the crime.

Another instance of the execution of Masonic penalty, is the death of William Miller, of Belfast, in Ireland. Samuel G. Anderton, a well known, and respectable inhabitant of Boston, whose occupation for many years has been that of a seafaring man, and whose reputation has been publicly certified to be above the impeachment of slander, has declared upon his oath before John W. Quincy, a justice of the peace in the city of Boston, which deposition was made in the month of March, 1830, and for substance is as follows:

"That in the year 1809, he was made a Mason in a Lodge-room near Lymekiln dock, in the city of Belfast, in Ireland, and became acquainted with a Mason by the name of William Miller, a miller by occupation, and resident of the place. That in the year 1813, he was taken prisoner of war on the high seas, and was transported to England, from wheuce, through Masonic influence, he was liberated, found means of conveyance to Ireland, and on the morning of the 4th of June, which was the King's birthday, he was in Belfast, saw, and had conversation with his friend William Miller. That Miller then told him that 'the Masons had offered to make him a Knight Templar free of charge, and that he had been strougly urged to atteud that evening, which he had agreed to do.'" Mr. Anderton had agreed also, to attend the same meeting. In the evening, Mr. Anderton received several degrees of Masonry, among which was the Knight Templar. Some time in the evening he was informed that there was to be a Masonic cxecution that night; that a Mason had violated his Masonic obligation, by saying "THAT A BOOK ENTITLED 'JACHIN AND BOAZ' WAS A TRUE BOOK," in connection with some other remarks, for which he deserved to die. Struck with horror, Mr. Anderton wished to leave the room, but was peremptorily denied permission to retire, being told "THAT IS NEVER ALLOWED ON SUCH OCCASIONS." Lot was cast who should be the executioners. The lot fell on a Dane, on a Swede, and on Mr. Anderton. Learning that William Miller was the persou to be executed, by the most heart-rending entreaties, Mr. Anderton was excused from the Masonic duty of being an executioner of his friend. The others plead no excuse. A cap of coarse cloth, to be drawn over the head, struug with a rope in the hem, to be drawn by the executioners round the neck, was the instrument which contained the machinery of death for the unsuspecting victim. The hour of midnight darkness arrived, the executioners took their stand near, and at the left hand of the presiding Masonic officer. All things being in readiness, Mr. Miller, mistrusting no danger, but with expectation of receiving a degree of Masonry, according to the promise made to him, was led iuto the room, hoodwinked, with his coat off and in a slow march was conducted near the executioners. The question was asked and repeated, agreeably to Masonic custom—"Who comes there? Who comes there?" The answer was bawled out, as the executioners seized him, "A damned traitor who has broken his Masonic obligation." As the cap of death came over his head, he had just time to cry, "O my God! are you going to murder me? O my wife! my children!" when his cries were stopped short by the suffocating cord drawn round his neck, with the full strength of the undaunted executioners, and the victim fell to the floor in the agonies of death. The executioners bracing their feet against his body, continued their tug at the rope with increasing violence, "while others of the fraternity fell upon the body, cut the throat, and then his left side and breast open, so as to show his heart; during which horrid scene, some of the thirty-five or forty persons in the room, exhibited signs of sympathy; but the greater part," to use Mr. Anderton's own words, "using the most profane, revengeful language, with their fists clenched, grinned with horrid approbation!!"

After the execution, they carefully conveyed the body from the Lodge-room in the third story of a building, and threw it into Lymekiln dock, after which Mr. Anderton left the city as soon as possible, and embarked for America in a Russian ship. Mr. Anderton further states, that he had experienced instances of shipwreck, and had met the enemies of his country at the awful cannon's mouth, but never before had those feelings which he experienced on being a witness to the Masonic execution of William Miller. Many particulars of Mr. Anderton's affidavit have been passed over for the sake of brevity, and the substance only of the whole has been given.

In corroboration of the foregoing statement, a Mrs. Agnes Bell, now resident of the city of Boston, has made oath before the same John W. Quincy, justice, testifying for substance as follows:

"That she was born in Belfast, in Ireland, and brought up within sight of Mr. Greenwood's house, where a tavern was kept in the lower story of the building at Lymekiln dock, over which, in the third story, was the Masonic Lodge-room described by Mr. Anderton. That she distinctly recollects seeing the dead body of William Miller, wet and muddy, before the hall of Mr. Greenwood, on the day after the King's birthday, in a certain year of her life, which she particularly designates, and which exactly corresponds with the year 1813, and the 5th day of June in that year, which was the very day following the evening of the horrid execution, as testified by Mr. Anderton. And she further states that Mrs. Miller was heard to say that her husband went to the Lodge the evening before in health, and that she hoped she would live to know who murdered him. And further, that the Masouic fraternity assembled on the occasion, formed one of the most numerous processions of the kind ever known in Belfast, and interred the body with Masonic honors!" O horrid works of darkness! Masons assembled in large procession, clad in the habiliments of mourning, professedly to lament over, and perform the Masonic ceremony of "INTO THY HANDS, ALMIGHTY FATHER, WE COMMEND THE SOUL OF OUR LOVING BROTHER,"—and thus inter the body of a professed worthy brother, whom they had Masonically executed the night before, as a perjured wretch, and a violator of Masonic obligations.

In further confirmation of the Masonic execution of William Miller, as testified by Mr. Anderton, there are also several gentlemen now residing in America, who were citizens of Belfast at that time, and have recently favored the public with certificates of their knowledge of the excitement produced in Belfast and that region, by the murder of William Miller, under circumstances corresponding with Mr. Anderton's affidavit.

Other instances of Masonic execution are before the public, and might be brought into the amount of testimony on the point before us, if it were necessary. But let it suffice to say, in general terms, there is little, if any room, to doubt that many of the numerous murders which have polluted this and other lands with blood, which horrid deeds have been palmed on some innocent or unknown persons, have been really the bloody fruits of Masonic executions, while, as at Belfast, the perpetrators themselves were mingled with the crowd, perhaps distinguished with Masonic badges of mourning, and heard to say, "ALAS! BROTHER," while the blood of vengeance was crying against them from the horrid place of execution. And it is awfully to be feared, that when the light of eternity shall shine on the darkness, and every secret thing shall be brought to judgment, it will then be found, that many of the sudden deaths in the world have been the result of Masonic VENGEANCE, in the execution of Masonic penalty in a Lodge-room, or personal dispatch by poison, or assassiuation; as the ghosts of the murdered Artemus Kenedy, near Boston, the poisoned Simmons, of Albauy, and a host of others, would doubtless testify now, were they permitted to speak.

Let it next be considered whether the laws of civilization justify the execution of Masonic peualty, or whether such execution, in the eye of the civil law, constitutes the act of murder.

The former position must be denied, and the latter affirmed, for this obvious reason, that the civil law makes no provision for the private trial, private conviction, private condemnation, and secret execution of any human being, in any case, for any offense whatever. The civil law requires that all accusations, trials, convictions, and executions, shall be public, and subject to public investigation. But the whole process which leads to, and terminates in Masonic executions, is done in secret. If Masouic law is violated, the accusation and trial of the offender are performed in the secret conclave of Freemasonry, and not a witness is admitted, even on the defense, unless he belongs to the fraternity. If Masonic testimony convicts the culprit, no sacrifice can atone. Death is the penalty; and vengeance never can be appeased short of execution. Either the laws of Masonry must be totally disregarded, or the offenders against the majesty of Masonic laws must be put to death in the execution of Masonic penalty. And the whole process, from beginning to end, must be done under cover of midnight darkness, or with the most profound secrecy. Hence, Masonic executions, being conducted in direct violation of the requirements of the civil law, must be pronounced unlawful.

In Masonic executions, the design is to take life. The act is premeditated. And in the performance, it may be safely concluded, that there is no want of the spirit of malice afore-thought, and vengeance, in operation. The conclusion, on the whole, then, must be obvious, that the civil law does not, CAN NOT justify the execution of Masonic penalties, but coudemns it IN TOTO as an act of murder. This must be evident from the very nature of the crime. What is it that constitutes murder in the judgment of the civil law? It is the taking of human life unlawfully, with design, and with malice aforethought. All these concomitants are comprised in every Masonic execution. The life of man is taken UNLAWFULLY, because done in seecret; with DESIGN, because premeditated; and with MALICE AFORETHOUGHT, because done in the spirit of vengeance. Consequently, every Masonic execution constitutes an act of murder. The doctrine is virtually admitted even by Masons themselves. Why did not the witnesses testify what they knew, when legally required so to do, in the case of the noted abduction in the State of New York? They tell us why; they were consciously dumb, and obstinately refused to declare the truth, for fear of implicating themselves in the murder of Morgan! How often is the question asked, "Must the whole Masonic fraternity be impeached, because a few miscreants, or outlaw Masons have MURDERED MORGAN?" The import of this Masonic question is an implicit acknowledgment, that those who did put Morgan to death, MURDERED him. If so, it is equally true, that all who advised, and aided knowingly, whether directly or indirectly, were accessories to his death, and consequently were murderers in the judgment of civil law, and in the sight of God. This settles the point that the Masonic institution stands chargeable with the blood of all the victims who have fallen sacrifices to its vengeance, in the execution of Masonic penalties. Although the horrid deeds of death may have been perpetrated by a few conscience-hardened, heaven-daring Masons of high sounding titles, and unknown to thousands of lower degrees, who would shudder at the thought of being accessory to an act of murder; yet such is the nature of the Masonic institution, that it makes provision for the commission of the highest crimes, and all who know this fact, and have been voluntary accessories to any instance of Masonic execution, are guilty of the blood which is charged upon the institution, whose blood-stained law they have sworn to support, and still determine to maintain.

The institution of Freemasonry not only makes provision for the COMMISSION of crime, but also for the CONCEALMENT of all crimes perpetrated under cover of Masonic secrecy.

One clause of Masonic obligation is thus expressed:

"I promise and swear that a Master Mason's secret, committed to me as such, and I knowing him to be such, shall remain as inviolable in my breast as in his own, Murder and Treason excepted, and they left to my own election."

In the Masonic oath, provision is made to conceal Perjury, Theft, Arson, and all other crimes with the above conditional exceptions. Should any crime, except murder and treason, be perpetrated, and the circumstances be committed as a secret to a brother Mason, that brother is bound by his Masonic oath, even in the Master Mason's Degree, to keep the secret forever, on penalty of death. But in the oath of the Royal Arch Degree, Masons are bound to keep the secrets of a companion without exception. The words are:

"I promise and swear, that a companion Royal Arch Mason's secrets, committed to me as such, and I know him to be such, shall remain as inviolable iu my breast as in his own, MURDER AND TREASON NOT EXCEPTED.

A modification of this oath, "to keep ALL the secrets of a companion WITHOUT EXCEPTION," amounts to the same import. For, as murder and treason are conditionally excepted in a LOWER Degree of Masonry, the oath of a HIGHER Degree to keep ALL the secrets of a companion WITHOUT EXCEPTION, amounts to the very same as MURDER AND TREASON NOT EXCEPTED."

Such provision is made by the institution of Masonry, to conceal enormous crimes. This awful truth has been verified to the shame, confusion and guilt of our whole country. The crime of murder has been concealed, so far as to

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issued by him, purporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationa ist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The author belonged to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughout the country forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is supposed by many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acquainted with Mr. Greene, and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y., and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—'The Storm Gathering;' "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

Publisher's Department.

We mention the fact, as it may encourage some of our workers that if they will bring (through the blessing of God) the Cynosure subscription list up to 10,000 names this year, next year we will pay the postage on the paper ourselves.

It is a year, nearly, since we commenced discontinuing subscriptions when the time was out unless directed to continue them; and this year's experience shows several things. It shows that the mail list does not apparently increase so rapidly as it would if this were not our custom. It shows that occasionally we remove the name of a friend who would pay if we would wait long enough. But on the other hand, it shows that in this way we obtain a sympathetic, prompt, set of readers who are sincerely endeavoring to promote this reform. That while we unintentionally offend a few, we please many who "hate a paper that they cannot get rid of." That we save sending papers to persons who will not read them and in substance say "Collect if you can" on the receipt of bills legally and morally just, which should be paid. It is unpleasant for us to remove from fifty to three hundred names monthly, and we hope our readers will prevent the necessity of such removal, if possible. But our readers can with us have the satisfaction of knowing that the subscribers of the paper are genuine persons who pay their proportion of what the paper costs instead of being dead beats who partake of the benefits of the paper at the expense of industrious, prompt paying friends and the distress of half paid publishers and editors.

We hope all who have promised to "send the money soon," will be sure to do so.

All persons whose subscriptions expire during the present month, are requested to write stating whether they wish the paper continued or not, for this is the last copy we send to those not heard from. We hope they will enclose the subscription price for another year.

How many new subscribers will you get next month?

Are there any more who will send or pledge six new subscriptions?

Postage on the Cynosure.

THE POSTAGE ON THE CYNOSURE MUST BE PAID AT CHICAGO. It is twenty cents a year.

The cost of postage now depends entirely on the size and weight, and therefore some smaller papers charge but fifteen cents; and others about the size of the Cynosure charge twenty-five cents a year for postage.

If the subscription price of the CYNOSURE was $2.50 or $3.00 a year, the price of many religious papers containing no more reading matter, we might afford to pay the postage ourselves, but at $2.00 a year we cannot do this with our present Subscription list.

Therefore let all send the postage, 20 cents a year, 10 cents for half a year with their renewals.

The commission on one new subscription for a year will pay the postage on your own and the new subscriber's paper. We would rather have the postage paid by commissions than in any other way.

When postage is not paid we shall have to shorten the time of subscription sufficiently to pay it.

Topics of the Time.

The ladies of Chicago have undertaken a war in the liquor traffic that would seem hopeless only to faith. But it is reason for gratitude that faith has already its encouragements. Permanent and comfortable headquarters are provided in the Young Men's Christian Association Rooms, where a daily temperance prayer-meeting is held, which as many as fifty or sixty gentlemen some times attend. Monthly business meetings are also held, and measures for more thorough and efficient organization and work are under advisement. Many drunkards have signed the pledge, and a friendly hand and sympathy is given to help them keep it. A note to the ladies of the city, asking that wine be banished on New Year's day was wisely heeded in many parlors. These items show some progress in cleansing the Augean stables of the liquor traffic in Chicago.

The election of Andrew Johnson, ex-President, to represent the State of Tennesee in the Senate, indicates more or less the popular feeling in the nearer South. Johnson left the executive chair with none to lament him, and many to execrate. The reconstruction policy inaugurated during his term, so different from the wise plan foreshadowed by Lincoln, and so disastrous in its effects, does not of course fall altogether to him, although his vain-glorious championship of the freedmen and mandlin obstinacy certainly precipitated the settlement of Southern affairs. Along with him, it is reported that in the next House of Representatives there will be twenty-two Union men and eight-six ex-Rebels who met each other in deadly strife during the late war. The revival of old and bitter feelings grows stronger with each day's discussion of Southern troubles. What issue may be reached it is not pleasant to contemplate; yet we are sure the Lord reigns, and amid all the strife and turmoil of inferior things, his grand purposes move on undisturbed.

"Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan his work in vain;
God is his own interpreter
And he will make it plain."

President Lincoln's views of reconstruction are briefly stated elswhere in this number. In the present condition of the readmitted States, they seem eminently wise and just. But it is useless to conjecture what "might have been." The colored men and their friends at the South need protection from the rapacious villains who are shooting them, driving them from their homes and means of livelihood. The obstinacy of the minority in Congress threatens to delay the Civil Rights Bill and other measures which, by enforcing justice, may bring in peace. But the policy of the Democracy for two months has been, as Mr. Conkling forcibly argued last week in the Senate, "to make reconstruction a miscarriage; to thwart it, baffle it, disturb, foment, revolutionize, and the time will come when the country, worn with commotion, will accept anything for a change."

Not long since Hon. Carl Schurz lectured in Chicago on Education. He advocated the rationalistic theory, popular in Germany and growing in favor here through foreign influence, that the remedy for social evils lies in the cultivation of the domestic virtues, that is, a knowledge and love of household duties, literature and art and the means of healthful recreation. Dr. Kittredge, of the Third Presbyterian Church, replied soon after, showing the fallacy of this extreme secular view, which throws aside the Bible, dethrones its Author, takes down the Cross, and attempts to regenerate society with its spiritual element left out. If such educators would undertake in a country of soulless men they would be appreciated. With us they deserve no credit for fine theories based on mistaken notions. Since men are spiritual beings, acting and acte uppon as such, whose souls tremble towards God their Maker as the needle trembles toward the pole, the Gospel of Jesus Christ can alone meet their deepest wants; and there is no true, or complete, or really benefic al education which does not include this as its groundwork. And of course such an education must include an intelligent knowledge of the Bible, the only book ever written with a thorough knowledge of the wants of its readers, and written successfully. We are pleased to notice an able article in the Christian Union from the pen of Rev. Lyman Abbott, published with a proviso, advocating the use of the Bible in our public schools in the propositions: "No system of public education can be maintained which does not afford moral and religious instruction," and "Morality cannot be taught without teaching religion."

"Hear, O Heavens; and Give Ear, O Earth!"

BY WOODRUFF POST.

It is a fact that there are effective ministers of unblemished reputation, known to be men of integrity everywhere, proscribed and shamefully maltreated by brother ministers and by lay-members of the church because they have, in the fear and love of God, striven to show the evils of Freemasonry and kindred oath-bound secret societies which have crept into the church.

It is well understood that the paternity of secret societies, Freemasonry, is an oath-bound craft arrogating the right to punish, even to the most barbarous death, any church member or citizen in this republic, or in the world, especially those who reveal. Many men, disgusted with its profanity, declare that they know by experience that Freemasonry is designed to subvert the Christian religion. And do we not find it true, the world over, that Masons eulogize it as superior to the Gospel of Christ and sufficient to fit them for heaven. (Even church members say, "I would leave the church before I would the lodge!") And, indeed, that is not an infatuation of a few, for, does not Masonry plainly teach, "We now find" (by the first three degrees) "man complete in morality and intelligence, with the stay of RELIGION added, to insure him of the protection of the Deity, and guard him against ever going astray. These three degrees thus form a perfect and harmonious whole; nor can we conceive that anything can be suggested more, which the soul of man requires." (Freemason's Guide, Sickels, p. 189.) We might add many quotations. This is enough. Precisely in harmony with this is the doctrine of Rev. Dr. Latimer. "Be true Masons and you will be the true servants of God," taught in our First Methodist Church in Rochester on "St. John's Day."

For defending the church against such blasphemy and insult to the Most High, good men are denounced as fanatics, insane, liars, traitors, etc., etc., and special effort is made to ruin them "soul and body." Nor are there found friends enough of Jesus who are willing to combine to expel this anti-Christ from our midst; their reputations and interests are too dear. They unite with our enemies who cry, "Away with him! Away with him!" In vain is it that they are reminded that thousands of Masons in "Morgan times" cast off the yoke and declared Masonry a supplanter of Christ and an enemy to the Government. Yes, they stop their ears and cry, Away, away with him! A disturber of Zion, cast him out! But, thank God, this is not universal. There are others who, though careful, are ever on hand to help unfold the banner of truth.

Masonic lecturers and the most zealous and popular Freemasons, find unbounded favor and open doors. Our churches and our homes are welcome to them. At any time with all their frippery and fantastic trumpery and infidelity, they can enter in and do as they list, though the blood of Morgan stain their skirts and rank blasphemy scald their lips. Be thou astonished, O heavens!

Are we forever as Methodists, to wink at, or aid and abet such uniform desecration of religious principles perpetually transpiring to our great degradation, and the distress of all true lovers of Zion? Witness the following incident among many, touching the pastor of our representative church in this city quoted from the Rochester Daily Express;

"THE ABELARD CLUB."

This Club is composed entirely of Knights Templar, and as the list of membership, which we produce below, will show, includes many of our representative citizens. . . . The club was named in honor of that venerable and eminent patron of Masonry, Abelard Reynolds. Their rooms, which are on the fourth floor of Power's block, have recently been enlarged and others added, until now they consist of a cloak room, TWO CARD ROOMS, one of which is elegantly fitted up as a parlor, and a room devoted EXCLUSIVELY TO BILLIARDS. The walls are decorated with photographs of different members, pictures and Masonic emblems. Special cards of invitation had been issued to the members and a few friends to be present yesterday at 12 M. to witness the presentation of an elegant tablet to Abelard Reynolds. At the hour named the parlor and adjoining rooms being filled, the Rev. D. H. Muller, Chaplain of the Club, stepped to the centre of the reception room and formally presented the tablet in the name of the club.

The following is (part of) his address:

"Honorable and beloved Father: Your loving spirit we are satisfied will be the best appraiser of its value. Richer than the gift, however, is the opportunity bidding us declare how cheering and inspiring your life and old age are to us. Before its wonderful state of ripeness, out of which any moment the flower of immortality may burst into bloom we linger with loving reverence. But love is active, and in beautiful discontent with verbal expressions, offers in generous freedom this engraved present, trusting that this savor of its spirit will be like the fragrant myrrh and frankincense the wise men brought to the infant Jesus. We pray you the enjoyment of many Christmas festivals here, for the hereafter your past life filled with wisdom, love and humility, furnish a foundation upon which to build a heavenly city, and through the sweet blue sky of hope this morning the structure rises. A glorious past lightens the future with a serene joy, and amid this beauty of earth and heaven that falls upon us with air full of melodies, and hearts of sincerest good will, we wait your patriarchal benediction. . . .

The tablet is designed in the Corinthian style of architecture, being one of the emblematic orders of the order of Masonry, and first in beauty. On each side of this beautiful table there are two corinthian columns standing on pedestals having plinths and connected at the top with grand Royal Arch with its key stone and splendid panels all surmounted with the proper entablature. The key stone in the arch has the proper circle containing the letters of the Royal Arch. The splendid panel on the left, the emblem of the Master's degree, and on the right, the council. Each pedestal is ornamented with the emblem of the Maltese cross, each highly gilded with gold. The centre of the tablet is engrossed with the Red cross of the order, brightly illuminated with gold rays, crown, &c., and it contains the names of the officers and members of the club, beginning with Abelard Reynolds."

To be Grand Chaplain of Masonic lodges and commingle in oath-bound intimacy with card and billiard players and idolaters seems to be no barrier to popularity and general acceptability in our church, while they who dare to lisp a rebuke to such compromise, and the machinations of a terrible, Christless, blasphemous, oath-bound, death-penaltied clique in our midst are suffered to be cast out as heathen dross, proscribed by a band of semi-desperadoes in our midst. This is strong but is it not true? A desperado is one who is "urged by furious passions." What is that which seeks the ruin of another? Crush him! What does that mean? The minority of good Methodists, men and women, groan under the weight of disgrace and shame heaped upon the Methodist church by Freemasonry and kindred secret societies.

Let men who have no Christ to serve be Masons, if they will; but, O Christian, stain not thy character by such alliances. But are we to be compelled to silence and see our honor trampled in the dust? Our discipline "so remarkable for perfectness," as Bishop Peck recently intimated in public, be counted as trash, to which we vowed allegiance and promised sacredly to keep? Are we to hush and see our churches desecrated? And let Christ be wounded in the house of his friends? Must he forsake with tears our own dear home to find one elsewhere, or else be forever crushed and our ruin sought as the monster exists? God forbid it. Save us, O save us! "Hear, O heavens; and give ear, O earth."

But why tell it abroad? Why not charitably cover up the sin? As well ask, Why did not Luther hide the blasphemies and indulgences of the Romish church? Or why did not Christ cover up the iniquities of the scribes and Pharisees?

We believe some of our bishops are waking up to responsibility in this matter. Bishop Peck, recently addressing the pastors and officials here gathered together, said with many other good things, "Brethren have nothing to do with rings," not finger rings, but clique rings, soul rings; rings by which Satan carries out his own corrupt and corrupting plans. Avoid THEM. Yes, shout it world-wide, avoid them!!

This is what the Methodist church needs most this very hour. Avoid rings! Clear it of rings and soon away goes its worldly conformity with its paraphernalia and concomitants forever. Yes, then will open the flood-gates and out will go the trash and rubbish which now obstructs the salvation of God. Let Methodists forsake their unholy alliances of oath-bound secrecy with whore-mongers, adulterers, blasphemers, "card players," profane idolators, spiritualists, necromancers, drunkard-makers and drunkards, pirates and murderers, "rings!" and be holy men. Then we shall no longer be under reproach, and the windows of heaven will open and let down upon us a blessing so great that there shall not be room enough to receive it.

But if we refuse and continue to rebel, we shall be a hissing and a by-word and shall be taken captive by the devil at his will. Let but "the authorities" wink at the tyranny of corrupting Masonry in our midst, trampling in the dust our ordinances and desecrating our churches and violating our discipline, and despising and persecuting our brethren, who, in righteous integrity, cry out against the iniquity, and our "destruction shall come as the whirlwind." We shall be carried into captivity, to be slaves to our Masonic Master's forever.

Degeneracy of Church Members.

BY D. J. HARRIS.

The deep solicitude of the hearts of no inconsiderable number of church members, to become popular and to seek the applause of men more than the approbation of God, is alarmingly strange but no less a fact. When church members become degenerate, the fact is soon disclosed by the tenor of their lives.

The Apostle Paul warned Timothy of like characters when he said, "For the time will come when they will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves, teachers, having itching ears. And they shall turn away their ears from the truth and shall be turned into fables." To meet with God's faithful defenders of the truth in prayer or class-meeting, would be quite out of their element; they no longer love the way of the cross. They think it a hard way; they are anxious to adopt a religion that does not require its devotees to walk in so narrow a way. O, no, they have conceived a more liberal view of religion. Some of them behold Freemasonry with its high-sounding titles and professions. They are elated, and are soon hood-winked and cable-towed into this mysterious and Christless order, "a false religious system of practiced concealment" claiming great antiquity. How vastly foreign is this to Bible truth. Of all subjects, religion is one of universal concernment; if it is of any vital importance, it is equally as important to one man as another; it conceals none of its principles from any class or part of mankind. God is not the author of any system of secretism. They are the inventions of the arch enemy, that he may more successfully accomplish his ruinous work among men.

The long train of teachers and prophets under the Old Testament dispensation addressed themselves to the entire Jewish nation. When Christ gave the apostles their commission, he required them to go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature. When the high priest asked Jesus of his disciples and of his doctrine, Jesus answered, "I spake openly to the world, I ever taught in the synagogue and in the temple whither the Jews always resort and in secret have I said nothing." Christianity has not one concealed principle, neither has it a secret worship, or secret government. The institutions of the church of Christ are established openly. It has no concern, lest its claims or principles should be too extensively or thoroughly understood. All its members are light-bearers; the whole of which may truly be compared to a "City set on a hill." The language of Jesus, is "If any man have ears to hear let him hear."

The Morning Dawneth.

BY S. A. GILLEY.

Under the above caption, the September number of the Companion and American Odd-fellow—has an article from J. W. Cornelius, P. G., P. C. P., a brief review of which we give below. The writer refers to a certain "poetic effusion" of Rev. Joseph Travis, which appeared some years ago in the Free Methodist, entitled "No JESUS THERE." It seems, that when first published, it was presented to the local press, with comments by the above Cornelius. He says it was brought to mind again by "late articles which have appeared in the papers from those who feel injured by the fact that the Government officials requested the Masonic fraternity and kindred societies to assist at the corner-stone celebration in Chicago on the 24th of June" last.

Believing that a candid reading of the lines to which he refers cannot fail to do some measure of good, we rejoice at his effort to force them upon the attention of those who otherwise would fail to see them; though the moral character of such effort is identical with the "wrath of man" while divinely over-ruled, is made to praise God. "Whether in pretense or in truth, Christ is preached; and I therein do rejoice."

According to the article in review, "To (by) those who see the ghost of a Morgan in the emblems and regalia of a lodge-room, the secret societies of the day are regarded as a hydra-headed monster, whose power is eventually destined to overthrow the State, desecrate the altars of God and wreck general desolation." While we disclaim all belief in "ghosts," we confess that as the gallows on which a criminal was hung, or the stake at which a martyr burned, would bring to mind the execution of the one, or the death-triumph of the other, so the "emblems and regalia of the lodge-room" ever bring to recollection Morgan foully murdered by the secret horde. We acknowledge that we look upon the "secret societies of the day as a hydra-headed monster," and believe that thereby the altar of God is frequently desecrated, as in the case of funerals conducted by these societies and that they are well adapted to overthrow a State, and work general desolation," and would eventually do so if their power was not broken.

Again we quote: "But let those fanatics howl, for the tidal wave is rolling over the earth to purify it of old bigotries and superstitions, and will break asunder the chains that have bound the nations in mental darkness and make mankind the willing subjects of designing and crafty leaders, who will not lay down the scepter without a struggle."

To this last let every good anti-secretist respond, "So mote it be." "Man in darkness and chains; how mournful the spectacle," and how cheering to know that "a tidal wave is rolling over the earth" that will break these chains and emancipate man from darkness into light. Again, what "old bigotries and superstitions" have so effectually "made mankind the willing subjects of designing and crafty leaders," as those connected with secretism? Though like Balaam, "Past Grand" Cornelius came out to curse, his curse is turned to a blessing; (see Num. xxiii. 8–10:) and we hail his changed prophecy of purification with delight.

We next have presented to us the "bone of contention," in the shape of "NO JESUS THERE," by Rev. Travis; following which is the best of "two excellent pieces written in rep'y" and published in the Northwestern Odd-fellow. Of this best piece, "respectfully addressed to Rev. Joseph Travis, by Geo. F. Marshall, P. G. M.," we would say that an attempt is made to offset the declaration "They have no Jesus there," by the shallow one, "There's friendship there."

Consider for a moment no attempt is made, directly or indirectly, to deny the allegation, thus assenting to it as a truth. Now what have they to give us in the place of Jesus? Why friendship! Having left out Christ, that friendship cannot be Christian, but must be the "friendship of this world" declared to be "enmity to God."

Eternal Punishments.

[We seldom see so much sound sense and sound religion combined in the same space as in the following from the New York Witness.—ED. CYN.]

There is no subject more debated than future retribution, and no place that more efforts are made to get rid of than hell. There is, indeed, one certain way of escaping it, and that is through Him who is the Way, the Truth and the Life; but that is the last way most men wish to take. They are much more desirous of putting away hell than sin, and no teachers delight them more than those who ignore future punishments. Every sentimental soul would dearly like to believe that all men might in some unrevealed way be finally saved, and even some would go the length of Burns in hoping that "auld Nick" himself might yet have a chance; but sentiment or benevolence have nothing whatever to do with this momentous question.

We have no possible knowledge of God or the devil, heaven or hell, except from revelation, and if we accept what that says on one side, we must equally accept what it says on the other.

Endless punishments are as clearly revealed as endless bliss, and life is the season God has given to flee from hell and rise to heaven. What terrible responsibility, then, do teachers assume who lull souls into a delusive security, till it is too late to awaken and repent.

Inconsiderate minds think eternal punishments incompatible with God's love, whereas they should regard the offer to all not only of exemption from them, but of a free and full salvation through the sufferings of the Son of God himself as the highest possible proof of Divine love. Let no one who rejects this salvation complain of hell.

Good Templar Prohibition.

To the Editors:

Lately I had the pleasure of hearing a Good Templar give an able address on "Prohibition." In the course of the lecture, he said the chief object of their order was to advance the Temperance cause. Feeling a deep interest in the prosperity of my country—endorsing the sentiment of the poet,

"My country if she's right—
If not, then make her so—
But still my country."

I would like to ask, could not the temperance cause be advanced as well without secrecy as with it? Has not the W. C. T. U., which is open, not secret, done more in six months to advance the temperance cause than all the secret orders have since their first inception?

If so, why introduce an element so objectionable? A good cause like temperance, does not need secrecy, and in a bad cause it should not be permitted.

But, it is asked, what is it that is so objectionable in secrecy? Is not this a free country? Have not all a right to do as they may see proper in such matters? Where is the wrong?

Answer—In a Democratic or Republican Government all are upon a par—having equal rights—forming one whole. Secret associations tend to destroy this unity by making distinctions, where there should be none—causing discord and dissensions. Once admit the principle and permit the practice to be fully carried out, and it will culminate in bloodshed and civil war, as now witnessed in several of our Southern States, under the guise and name of "Ku-Klux" and "White Leagues."

Nor is our country alone in her troubles, arising from secrecy. Prussia has her's also from the oldest secret order now existing—the Jesuits. They are now giving King William and Bismarck a world of trouble, and may yet succeed in overturning the Government Bismarck has lately said the Jesuits were the cause of the late Franco-Prussian war; that Napoleon would not have declared war only for the Jesuits urging and deceiving him.

Secrecy begets a spirit of selfishness. It goes on the principle of the old man's prayer—"O Lord, bless me and my wife, Joe and his wife, us four and no more." But it is said the family is a secret society, and has its secrets. True, every family has private matters, that none but the family has the right to know or do with. But suppose the family to be composed of eight or ten persons and a part would form a secret order among themselves, how long would peace, good order and harmony continue in said family circle? Not long. True, also, every church or congregation has private matters of its own that do not concern outsiders, and of which they have no right to know or meddle with. But if one-half of the congregation would form a secret association among themselves, with signs and countersigns, passwords, grips, winks, becks and nods, when the congregation would come together on Sabbath morning in church—what would the uninitiated think of their mystic brethren? And what would they think of themselves? "Let brotherly love continue," says the Apostle. But how long would it continue under such circumstances? PROHIBITIONIST.

The Purrow.

There are three, and it may be more, heathen societies among the African people on the west coast, which are so similar in many respects to the secret societies of this and other countries that they may be called secret orders.

The Purrow is a large and growing organization in Sherbro and the surrounding country. Persons of rank and influence in the country belong to and carry on the work of this strange order; and all the people are expected to honor it and regard its law inviolable in its relation to political and domestic affairs. Purrow law stands higher than other laws of the land, and no one dares offend the Purrow without incurring guilt and a penalty.

The enactments and counsels of the Purrow do not come before the public without a direct order from the Purrow, through Purrow messengers, who go to the people, from village to village, in a very peculiar dress.

This society is characterized by "devil-worshipers," who bury their dead with high Purrow honors, make feasts for the "devil," and also for their departed ones, if it is supposed by any one that the spirits are angry.

The spirit or agent of the society is called the "Purrow-devil," and some of the people, especially the women, suppose he is a spirit, and cannot be seen.

An African missionary says of this agent that "he speaks through a trumpet made of a bottle, with a hole in the neck, like a flute. He also has an interpreter, who is privy to all the wishes of the Purrow, and he speaks what they wish, and not what is spoken by the trumpet. What the man with the trumpet says must be done, however, even to the taking of life. No woman is allowed to see either the trumpet or the man using it; and if he should, he must die."

The place of meeting is called the "devil-bush," and the meetings are held in secret. Men and boys are forced into this bush, and are commonly detained in it for days, and even weeks, to receive the teachings of the Purrow. Women do not belong to this society, and must sing "Yip-e-ow-way," and clap their hands when they walk about the towns or the farms during the meetings of the society, so that the guard may inform them when they are too near the Purrow.

It is also well said of this society that "it stands in sworn opposition to every system of religion and government not its own, and that it greatly promotes idolatry and amuletism."

This society has given considerable trouble to some of our missionaries, while trying to open new stations, and securing the help and sympathy of the people. The word goes out that "the missionaries are going to take the land and possess it, and change the laws and customs of our forefathers."

About one year ago the Purrow sent messages to Chief Caulker, desiring him to allow a Purrow-bush near Shengay. The chief utterly refused, telling them that God's house was in the town, and that they did not want the Purrow there. Many members of the Purrow were displeased with it and have renounced the order and become the followers of Christ. May it yet be driven to utter oblivion by the light of the saving Gospel.—M. B. Hadley in the Missionary Visitor.

President Lincoln's Reconstruction Policy.

A correspondent of the Cincinnati Commercial had recently published the following opinion of Pres. Lincoln on the restoration of the Southern States to national principles. It was given in the dark days of 1862-3 at a meeting of the President, Secretary Stanton, Gov. Tod of Ohio, Samuel Galloway and the writer, who is the sole survivor of the conference. Mr. Lincoln is reported to have said: "What concerns me, however, is the after consequences of this wholesale emancipation of four millions of people, who, for a period of nearly two centuries, have been in the most absolute bondage, and who, necessarily, are totally devoid of the requisite intelligence to enable them to take care of themselves. If my life is spared, and on me should devolve, in connection with the National Legislature, the solving of this important problem, I am free to say right here, that, in my opinion, the blacks should be regarded in the same light as an infant just born, and necessarily dependent on its parent for the most careful and nurturing aid; that the benign spirit of education must form the chief cornerstone of their nurture; that in this most important matter they must learn to crawl before they are permitted to stand upright and walk. What I mean by this simile is, that they cannot, on the instant, be qualified to take care of themselves; that it would be futile and dangerous to intrust them with a share of the governing power. They cannot be expected to grasp, on the instant, the true principles of Republican government. In short, gentlemen, the now ignorant blacks must be educated up to the situation.

As with some, I do not entertain any fears of their former masters—that they will seek to wreak vengeance on former slaves, looking on them as the prime cause of their discomfiture. I believe, on the contrary, the whites will treat the blacks with kindness. On them (the former slaves) they (the whites) will be compelled to lean for years for their very subsistence. To guard against anything of the vengeance order, however, and to gain time for the education of the blacks, I would place the subdued States under a kind of semi-military territorial government, granting a partial voice to the blacks, after a while, in the government of the territory, but withholding an indiscriminate ballot until its purport was better and thoroughly understood by them. In this way I would place the Southern States and people under a governmental pupilage, compelling them to look to the General Government as their parent and protector. This state of things should, in my opinion, continue for at least ten years. In that time great progress could be made in the education and general enlightenment of the blacks; the former masters would be enabled to get used to the changed situation; the population would be beneficially leavened by emigration from the North and the European States to such a degree as to make it safe and proper to again admit the recusant South, in a body, to full communion with their Northern brethren. Any other course would, in my opinion, be dangerous, unwise, and full of disastrous consequences.

Spurgeon says, "George Fox has left us a third great legacy, namely, his testimony against the abomination of war. When I first read George Fox's life I could think of nothing but Christ's Sermon on the Mount. It seemed to me that George Fox had been reading that so often that he himself was the incarnation of it; for his teaching is just a repetition of the Master's teaching there—just an expansion and explanation of the primary principles of Christianity. I am always glad to hear of a soldier being a Christian; I am always sorry to hear of a Christian being a soldier. Whenever I hear of a man who is in the profession of arms being converted, I rejoice; but whenever I hear of a converted man taking up the profession of arms, I mourn. If there be anything clear in Scripture, it does seem so me that it is for a Christian to have nothing to do with carnal weapons; and how it is that the great mass of Christendom do not see this I can not understand.

Surely, it must be through the blinding influences of the society in which the Christian church is cast. But Fox's singularly clear mental vision could see that to buckle on the carnal sword was virtually to be disobedient to Christ. The Christian who enlists in the army of any earthly king forgets that they that take the sword shall perish with the sword, and that Jesus has said, 'Resist not evil: but if any man smite thee on thee one cheek, turn to him the other also;' 'My kingdom is not of this world, else would my servants fight.' May the day come when war shall be regarded as the most atrocious of all crime, and when, for a Christian man, either directly or indirectly, to take part in it, shall be considered as an abjurgation of his principles. The day may be far distant, but it shall come, when men shall learn war no more. A right view of the true character of war may hasten that happy era."

The Pall Mall Gazette (England) says: "If complete readiness for war is the best means of insuring the continuance of peace, the tranquility of Europe must have been effectually secured this year, in which large additions have been made to the forces of every European power. The proposed legislation in reference to the German landstrum will increase the military strength of Germany to an extent hardly yet realized, though the Spener Gazette estimates the increased force arising from a first call of the landstrum at 800,000 men. The French army will, beginning from this year, be increased within twelve years to 1,800,000, a force supplemented by a landstrum organization not less extensive than that of Germany. Russia will, in the same period, muster a standing army of 750,000 men, and a reserve of 1,740,000 men. Austria has made so much progress in the development of her military resources that she could take the field with from 500,000 to 600,000 men. Italy could follow with 40,000 men, and Turkey with 200,000; while we have 500,000 men to defend our own soil, and could contribute from 70,000 to 80,000 men toward the prosecution of a European war."

—The London Times, of a recent date, takes a sober view of the situation in Europe. "In the gloom surrounding us," says the Times, "one thing is perceptible—all are arming. Germany is arming en masse; the surrounding nations, including the best of the world, cannot do otherwise." And why does Germany arm every available man of her mighty forty millions? There is no single power on the continent that is able to cope with her on her ordinary peace footing. There are no political objects upon which any of the surrounding powers could concentrate and allay themselves against her. There is no question of boundaries in dispute—and, in brief, there is nothing in the commercial, maritime, political, or civil situation upon which a casus belli can naturally rest. There is one danger, and one only, for and against which Europe is arming; and that is the mischievous, intermeddling, unscrupulous power of the papacy, which is so busy fomenting discord and war, and compacting belligerent alliances in every European state except Russia. The last-named empire is calm and peaceful, reposing in the plentitude of her power—because, and only because Jesuitism, Ultramontanism and Papacy in its hydra-headed forms has no footing on her soil, and no means of acquiring the necessary hold upon the superstitions of the people.—Interior.

Reform News.

From the General Agent—Prospects in Ohio.

XENIA, O., Jan. 21, 1875.

A wanderer such as I am can well appreciate the cordial greetings and welcome of a friend and brother in Jesus. Such it was my privilege to enjoy from several of that noble band of Christian workers at Dayton on my arrival last evening. Stepping from the cars when the shadows were lengthening, one of the most conspicuous objects in the crowd was the stately form of Bishop Weaver, whose intellect is worthy its elevated throne above the men of ordinary stature. Shaking the strong hand and exchanging a word of friendly greeting and parting, the Bishop left for Cincinnati, and I made my way to the Book-Room of the United Brethren to find brethren Shuey, Wright, Tobey and others, each at his post. Accepting the proffered hospitality of Bro. Wright, I was soon seated at his fireside, surrounded by this genial family, where the hours passed rapidly in social and Christian converse. I was disappointed in not seeing Bro. Dillon, who is engaged in a protracted meeting in a neighboring town. May God bless this noble young brother and give him many souls. I had little time to compare views with any of the brethren, except Bro. Wright, about the approaching Ohio Convention; but was exceedingly gratified to find him so thoroughly enlisted and ready to work for its success. The United Brethren will be represented at Man field, by one of their ablest men, and we confidently hope every church in the State will be fully represented by delegates. The Covenanters, the Congregationalists, the United Presbyterians, the Free Methodists, the Wesleyans, the Episcopal Methodists, the Presbyterians, the Baptists and others are by their representative men rallying around the standard, and it is no time to falter, even though some of those who "sit in Moses' seat," (under the law of the church) would persuade "the common people" to keep silent while this dark schemes so fitly characterized by Dr. Thomas, of Lane Seminary, in a speech before the Presbytery at Piqua, O., as "THE GODLESS APE OF THE BRIDE OF CHRIST," is leading our young men, and through them the church and state, into captivity.

I cannot now report the work in Logan Co. in detail, farther than to say that the Lord has there a consecrated band, and that our reform has in Logan, "soul, body and spirit." I lectured eleven times, preached four sermons in thirteen days, and received in free-will-offerings to our cause, $81.41; and the way is opened I trust for very great enlargement and extended good.

On arriving here I found Bro. Carson occupied for an hour at the Seminary, and have embraced the opportunity while waiting to serve you this pencil sketch along with names of subscribers which please find enclosed.

Your Bro. J. P. STODDARD.

From the Illinois Agent.—Notes by the Way.

DEAR BRO. KELLOGG:—I spoke once in the Baptist church in Chatsworth, a fine village in Livingston county. This subject had never before been presented and the lodge people were astonished at my presumption, but gave us a respectful hearing.

My next point was at the U. B. church west of Wellington where our friend Hickman has done, and is doing a noble work in this reform. From thence I went to Elliot, Ford county, where I spoke twice in the U. B. church to attentive audiences. A recent revival had prepared the minds of the people for the reception of the truth.

From thence to Champaign, where I spoke in the Congregational church to a fair audience. The ministers of the several churches, except the Congregational, refused to read notices of my lectures. From thence I returned to the U. B. church near Wellington, where I found a full house. Here a prominent Mason very positively denied the truth of my statements and called me a liar, but afterwards apologized for it, and challenged a debate at Hoopeston on Friday evening next which I accepted.

My next point was Hoopeston, where I spoke twice to good audiences and feel that a good impression was made.

Last night I spoke in the large school room in Wellington, and to-day I go south. The Lord has been very gracious and given me strength to endure many trials. By-and-bye he will give us a great victory.

Yours for Christ,
H. H. Hinman.

Editor of the Cynosure:

I have been looking for some time for an account of a lecture in this place, but have not yet seen any report.

Bro. W. M. Givens lectured for us in the United Brethren church, Dec. 7th, 8th and 9th. On the first evening his subject was Odd-fellowship; on the second, the Religion of Freemasonry. He also spoke briefly on the grange, which aroused that fraternity into calling out that the statements were false, that the lecturer had better go home and mind his own business, and not be talking of things he know nothing about. The next night Mr. Givens procured one of the books used in the grange in this place from a member, and quoted from it the same passage he had read the night before. Then they kept silent. He then opened the lodge in due form and caused quite a sensation among the considerable number of Masons present, some of whom were old neighbors and those with whom he used to meet in lodge when he was an adhering Mason. When through, he called on a Baptist brother who is a Mason: "There is Bro. Tenas, he knows whether I have given the signs and grips all right or not. He is at liberty to speak." The person referred to got up all in a tremble and began muttering, but could not distinctly say anything; so Bro. Givens asked him to say yes or no. He sat down saying he did not propose to answer. He afterward began a personal abuse, but it amounted to nothing with the public. Bro. Givens handled the case well. Few know better how to expose the order. Those wanting lectures will do well to call on him.

The lectures caused a great stir in the fraternity. They had a great supper lately in which all parties joined, Masons, Odd-fellows, grangers, Universalists, Baptists and Methodists. They commenced in the Universalist church, ate their supper in the Baptist church, and then repaired to the Methodist church in the evening to hear the speaking in which the orders were highly praised, as I am informed. Last Sabbath they buried one of the members of the Freemason lodge. The funeral services were performed in the Methodist church, with preaching by a Universalist glorifying the order above the church of Christ. After the sermon the order was called around the coffin by three raps of the gavel. After a short ceremonny, at a second rap all fell on their knees, and one, a very wicked man, read a mock prayer. Now, Mr. Editor, when such heathen performances can take place in a Christian church, how can we as Christians expect to prosper? The Methodist pastor I am informed is not a Mason, but nearly all his male members are. I think he felt bad on the occasion.

Your brother as ever,
A. Showalter.

Larwill, Whitley Co., Ind., Jan. 25, 1875.

Dear Brother K:—Passing through Lansing, Michigan, I arrived at Saginaw at 11:30 P. M. of the 14th, and after copying my letter to the Cynosure, which was written aboard the train, I retired. After a late breakfast and an early dinner combined, I went to the court-house, and transacted the business which had brought me there; and then, (as my train homeward would not start until evening) I turned my attention to "doing"

THE CITY OF SALT AND LUMBER.

How lumber is made was no mystery to me; but how so much of it is made as one sees in Saginaw is rather a matter of wonder. But the salt works were a novelty, and sometime, I may write a description of how they make so much salt in this exceedingly salty city. Saginaw claims a population of thirty thousand, and has an immense traffic in its specialties—pine lumber and salt. Leaving Saginaw at four in the evening, I arrived at Chessening at about five, where I stayed till the next evening. I found the grange in full blast here, being only a new thing. Their grange in C. is about six months old, and though I learned that several had left it already, I found a number who were quite enthusiastic. On Saturday at five I took the train again and arrived at Waterloo City at 12:30 in the night. I went to Bro. Jefforde, and on Sunday morning went to meeting at the U. B. church at eleven, and found they were in the midst of a gracious revival. Bro. Geo. W. Crawford has been the U. B. pastor for nearly two years, and has demonstrated the fact that the principles of the U. B. church may be maintained in cities without detracting from its success. He is a staunch opposer of secretism, and yet very successful in his labors. During the progress of this meeting the M. E. preacher came out and offered his services. Bro. C. asked him if he was a Mason. Upon his answering in the affirmative he was told by Bro. C. that he could not consistently ask his aid. This incensed the gentleman and he immediately began to circulate false statements of what Bro. C. had said. All the guns of secretism have been and still are brought to bear against the U. B. church, here, and yet it steadily holds the largest congregations, and is having the greatest success in its revival efforts of any church here. A suitable reward for its adherence to the truth.

On Sunday and Monday evenings I preached for brother Crawford, to large congregations, and notwithstanding I had lectured in the same church, the interest of the meeting was not diminished by my preaching. On Sunday evening seven came to the altar to seek Christ, three of whom found peace. On Monday evening ten were forward for prayer, a number of whom arose and testified for Christ. Thus God is working for the people who love him, and serve him in sincerity and in truth.

I trust God will open the eyes of United Brethren ministers everywhere to the fact that they can lose nothing by a firm and consistent maintainance of their principles. And that he will sustain their cause if "they trust in him and do the right;" for—

"The pure testimony put forth in the Spirit,
Cuts like a sharp two-edged sword.
And hypocrites now are most sorely tormented
Because they're condemned by the word.
The pure testimony discovers the dross,
While wicked professors make light of the cross,
And Babylon trembles, for fear of her loss."

Sincerely yours,
John T. Kiggins.

Lectures in Whitley Co., Ind.

Larwill, Ind., Jan. 26, 1874.

Dear Bro:—I feel it my duty to inform you of lectures here, two in Larwill M. D. church, two in Troy Center, and two in Bethel church (Winebrenarian), delivered by brother Kiggins, an excellent speaker. He was just such a man as we needed here in our neighborhood, very plain and as bold as a lion; and I think he has raised a goodly number by his lion's paw from the rubbish of the Masonic system. But two or three of the Masonic order have lost their jewel, the silent tongue, and at the same time were too cowardly to enter into a fair discussion. They cannot stand it if the truth is told them. But we've had a glorious time. A goodly number have been made glad, especially myself and family. I have never enjoyed myself so much at any other occasion. These four days were a glorious time for me. I have ever been opposed to all secret institutions, but never had an opportunity to work against them. But now the time has come. The work of the Lord is to be done, not by angels in heaven only, but by the instrumentality of men that are fitted by God for the very purpose. I know that I have made myself some enemies among secrecy men, because they do not know that I am working in the good cause of Christ's kingdom; that I would like to see them snatched out of Satan's power. I pray for those who would be losed from the chains of darkness and brought into the marvelous light of God's dear Son, Jesus Christ the righteous. Truly yours,

John Shuh.

Masonic Ministers.

Editor Cynosure:—I read with strong sentiments of approval the article in the Cynosure of the 21st inst., headed, "The Latest Exposition," and signed "Royal Arch." Especially do I sympathize with the strictures of that article as they bear upon ministers of the Gospel who connect themselves with Masonic lodges. The article is severe, but it is the severity of simple truth, and ought to attract the reading of every Masonic minister in the United States, and cause him to hide his head for shame, that he has been wicked enough, or fool enough, to identify himself with an institution so opposed to the spirit of Christianity. The most lamentable thing connected with the revival of Masonry is that ministers of the Gospel lend it their approval and serve at its altars. To us, who are not ignorant of the infamous character of the institution, this seems strangely inconsistent. I confess that when I see ministers of the Gospel lending their influence to the support of this system of heathenism, if it does not destroy my faith in Christianity itself, it destroys my faith in their Christianity. It has come to this with me also; I will not pay for the support of a Masonic minister. I will not hear him preach if I can conveniently avoid it. Masonry and Christianity are at antipodes, and it is hard to have faith in the Christian integrity of the minister who, at this day, seeks a connection with a Masonic lodge, whatever the motive he may profess.

As a Baptist, I am ashamed and dismayed at the thought of the number of ministers, young ministers, in my own denomination, who have become entangled by a base alliance with this system of darkness. One brother told me he received his degree in Batavia in the very lodge of which Morgan was a member and in which his brethren coldly discussed and sanctioned the proposition to murder him, in order to prevent the publication of his book. In two obituary notices, of two clergymen who have recently deceased, published in the Watchman and Reflector, I notice that the writers are careful to mention the fact that the ministers were members of the Masonic fraternity. In making mention of the fact did they intend to compliment Masonry or the ministers? Doubtless the "old handmaid" is pleased when men of reputable standing help to keep her in countenance; but it is a poor recommendation to me when Masons point to ministers and say, "these are our jewels." It argues a fatal defect in one's Christian character, that, when he knows, or might know, what Masonry is, without submitting to the unmanly and degrading process of initiation, he yet consents to go through with it. —I have studied Masonry for fifty years, and though I never had the cable-tow about my neck, I have no doubt but that I know more of the institution than nineteen-twentieths of those now connected with lodges. It is possible for any one for a trifling outlay, to know what Masonry is. The presumption, therefore, is that the object of men and ministers now in becoming Masons, is something beside a a desire to gain knowledge or gratify curiosity. The motive, presumably, is worldly, selfish, devilish. It is not faith in the divine promise, but trust in a selfish and worldly combination, which may help in possible straits, help to rise if one falls into immorality and under the condemnation of the church; or perhaps some from merited condemnation when charged with guilt. How many a wretch, lay and ministerial, has Masonry extricated from the worst of scrapes! Paul.

The Headship of Christ.

"He hath on his vesture and on his thigh a name written: King of kings and Lord of lords."—Rev. xix. 16.

In the book of Revelation we have a record of those events that shall close the history of the church on earth. Amid all the scenes that are so gloriously described in this vision, Christ occupies the highest and foremost place. In civil government, Christ is viewed as head over all. Christ is not merely the king and head of Zion, but king of nations, by virtue of that power by which he is invested by the Father. "The Father hath put all things under his feet, and gave him to be head over all things to the church." Standing in an important relation to the church, it is on her behalf that he takes to himself this universal power and reign. We see a nation (by some called Christian) that refuses to act according to the truth that is here revealed. The very claims of morality and justice, the best interests of society, the welfare of rulers and of all classes of their subjects and the claims of God, the moral Governor, demand that the laws of nations should be regulated by the Word. The law, as contained in the Decalogue in particular, and in the Scriptures in general, recognizes all the relations in civil life, and inculcates the various duties connected with these relations: parents and children, masters and servants, husbands and wives, rulers and subjects. Thus the Christian religion must tend to improve the morals, peace and prosperity of a nation. The state is made by God's law to be subservient to the interests of the church. Both have a distinct form of administration, and in this the one has not to interfere with the other. Let it be admitted that a national profession of religion is lawful and scriptural, then that religion is to be protected and supported by the State by those ways and means that are consistent with the spirit of Christianity in furthering her interests; not a bare profession of religion united in by a people of a multitude of opposite religions.

Hall Prince Lodge, No. 231,
F. & A. Masons, Princeton, Ind.,
January 17, 1866.

This is to certify that at a stated meeting of the above named lodge, held at their hall December 25th, 1865, brother Ephraim Thomas, a Master Mason, having paid his dues in full, up to this meeting, was upon his own petition permitted to withdraw his membership therefrom. Witness my hand and the real of this lodge this the 17th day of January, 1866.

WM. H. EVANS, Sec.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The above is a true copy of my demit from the Masonic fraternity. I have been requested to have it published in your paper. Secret societies are not flourishing in this country just now as they could wish, but then I think that they are getting along as well as the good Lord wants them to. A Mason said a few weeks since that I was a bogus Mason; that Morgan was not murdered by Masons. I had a Mason give me a grip yesterday, in Paola, but I did not answer. I will not stoop so low as that. I preached against secrecy last Sabbath, and made one Mason flutter. He has been howling and groaning ever since. He is a Methodist class-leader, but I have no confidence in any man's Christianity who adheres to secrecy.

EPHRAIM THOMAS.

Extract from a Letter.

[Written to a brother who is just emerging from the darkness of Masonry, by MRS. H. E. HAYDEN.] While I was spending a few days at Bro. C——'s in Dixon, two young men came there to spend the night. They were mere boys, the eldest probably not more than nineteen. In conversing with them the subject of secret societies was mentioned. I said, the greatest objection I had to Masonry was, their dreadful murderous oaths. Said I thought it was not right for any society of men to enjoin upon each other such awful oaths. They both replied: "If a man would take those oaths and break them he ought to die." They said they were only grangers. Had never joined any other secret society. I said to myself, Is this young America? Are these the excellent principles instilled into our young men's minds by secret societies? Masonry is the mother of all secret societies. The grange is her youngest daughter. (How much she looks like her mother, don't she?) Already has she taught her votaries that the oath of a secret society is paramount to the laws of our land, and paramount to the laws of God. God's law says, "Thou shalt not kill." Now, who will contend with the Almighty? And who will measure arms with him? These government-destroying, soul-damning institutions, out to be swept from our Republic with the besom of God's wrath. These two young men told me they were both members of the Lutheran church. But men entertaining such principles will go to hell, I don't care if they belonged to a thousand churches. Americans have two gods that they worship. The one is Masonry and the other is Fashion. The great majority of the people are worshiping these gods. Only a few stand erect and say (like Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego on the plains of Dura,) we will not bow down to these gods nor serve them. If we speak ought against these gods, the worshipers make about as much ado as the Ephesians did when they cried out, "Great is Dianna of the Ephesians." By far too many of our church members are like the old "Samaritans, who feared the Lord and served their own gods." Our National Christian Association, opposed to Secret Societies, held Nov. 8th, as a day of fasting and prayer, that God will hasten the overthrow of Masonry, etc., and we do expect to see this American Dagon fall to the ground.

While I was visiting in Dixon, this text often passed through my mind: "For all that is in this world, the lusts of the flesh, the lusts of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the Father, but of this world." We have only to look around us to see how much is purchased, made up and put on, merely to gratify the lusts of the eyes, without any reference to comfort, convenience, or even good taste. And this text in Psalms often occurred to me: "Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity." Ever since the sanctifying fire passed through my heart, I have had a perfect hatred for the "vain pomp and glory of the world." It does disturb me so, to see women professing to be followers of the Saviour, "who had not where to lay his head," (and whose only ornament was a seamless coat and a crown of thorns,) adorning themselves just as sinners do.

OUR MAIL.

Hope Davis, Carpenterville, Ill., writes:

"After the Israelites had passed the Jordan and compassed Jericho and taken it, they went up to take Ai and were defeated. And why were they driven back? It was because there was an Achan in the camp. His sin was for taking things forbidden. If one man's sin cursed all Israel by hiding in a secret place those things taken and covering them up (which amounts to the unfruitful works of darkness) for which they stoned him and all his family to death, need we wonder why we are cursed as a nation, as a community, and as a church, when there are so many Achans among the preachers of the Gospel and in the church, which help to make up the image of the beast spoken of in the 13th chapter of Revelation? I think the Lord will not bless the labors of any one who has joined himself to the image of the beast—the unfruitful works of darkness. We are told to reprove them."

Rev. A. Hard, Painted Post, N. Y., writes:

"I would like to know what the prospect is as to securing the Carpenter house for a book-room?"

We have been waiting the return of Rev. J. P. Stoddard before completing arrangements for raising the required amount. But we hope soon to have something more definite to say.

Rev. C. E. Allen, Birmingham, Ia., sends a club of nine new subscriptions. Cannot many other pastors do as well?

Dr. S. H. Spencer, Bazetta, O., writes:

"There is a strong anti-secret feeling among the people, and several prominent men will not vote for any one that belongs to any secret order. . . . If you advocate woman's suffrage I fear it will be an injury to the cause we wish to advance."

Rev. P. G. Schmogrow, Covington, O., writes:

"I have long been convinced that secret-societyism, in principle and practice, tends to undermine our free, political institutions and the essential foundations of Christianity. That it is, therefore, dangerous to the civil and religious liberty granted to us by the fundamental principles of our government, and should be suppressed by law, or at least be required to be open to inspection in all respects to all, which, however, would amount to its suppression. . . You have my heartfelt sympathy and interest in your anti-secret society cause; and you shall have my co-operation to the extent of my ability."

Isaac Elliot, Marion, Ind., writes:

"I become weary and sick when I think how weak and timid people are in standing up for the right and advocating a righteous cause. But I rejoice when I remember that God never leaves the world entirely without a few brave hearts that are not afraid to declare his whole council. My prayer is that the cause (anti-secrecy) may prosper and grow, as I am sure it is doing in these parts."

Aaron C. Salisbury, Cherokee, Ia., writes:

"I like the paper very much, and the principles it advocates are none too radical for me. . . I hate the lodge because I believe it is evil."

This is Scriptural, "Abhor that which is evil; cleave to that which is good."

Amos Whitson, Valley Mills, Ind., writes:

"I have got about eighty names to those petitions and think I shall get more."

J. W. G. McCormick, Emporia, Kan., writes:

"I spent the holidays on the old Kansas Indian reserve and found many good Christian people there, and several friends of the anti-secrecy movement. Among them one seceding Master Mason. He says that since he became a Christian, he has entirely abandoned Masonry, and thinks it an anti-Christian institution."

M. Liscomb, Goodrich, Mich., writes:

"You are in the right cause. As long as I can work and talk I will go against these damnable secretisms; for they are injurious to both church and community. This I know by experience both at home and abroad."

I. L. Wicks, Seneca Falls, N. Y., writes:

"We are constant readers of the Cynosure and would be lost without it. It helps us in our battles with the lodge-men and their name is legion, for they are many. But do not be discouraged in your good work as your paper is a power in the land, and God will bless and ere long give the victory."

R. B. Hall, St Charles, Minn., writes:

"I have sent the paper to all who would read it, and think it has done a great deal of good for they begin to speak out against the lodge."

Wm. A. Dains, Elkhorn Grove, Ill, writes:

"I am with you in your efforts to get rid of secretism. Although I have never seen the inside workings of Masonry or Odd-fellowship, yet I have seen enough of their outside results to convince me that the entire system is nothing but fraud, deception and folly. My father was a Mason of the third degree, and a citizen of Cortland county, N. Y., at the time of Morgan's murder, at which time he renounced Masonry, and has never been inside of a lodge since. He is now past 74 years of age, and although he considers himself bound by his oath not to divulge their secrets, yet his advice to his sons and friends is, and always has been, 'To have nothing to do with Masonry.'"

A. Showalter, Vermillion, Ill., writes:

"I wish to continue till the war is over, or I fall in my armor with my face to the enemy. I will soon be 68 years old, but not too old to do good, God being my helper."

James Crook, West Mecca, O., writes:

"I am satisfied that the principles of your paper are the ones that will kill the serpent that is coiling around the church and state. . . The Christian Cynosure is the best reading except my Bible."

Rev. A. H. Springstien, Ypsilanti, Mich., writes:

"I like the Cynosure more and more. It is now the best of the many papers that I take."

Van R. Carey, Freeport, Ill., writes:

I am 70 years old. My first vote was Anti-masonic, and it shall be till I die."

Rev. N. A. Quammen, Christiana, Minn., writes:

"As it (the Cynosure) is a strong advocate against the secret societies, it evidently ought to be supported by all who earnestly advocate Christian principles and oppose evil in all its forms. I may not be far from the truth when I mantain that the Catholic church and secret societies go hand in hand to overthrow the civil laws and the Christian religion. But alas, few seem to see the danger."

J. S. Yaukey, Chambersburg, Pa., writes:

"I will send you my petition next week with about two hundred signers. This morning I am resting in Christ. O what a sweet rest! Yet one thing grieves me very much, to think that persons who profess Christ will have connection with that which is anti-Christ (the lodge.) O that God may deliver them from so vile a thing."

Wm. Barnes, McCleary, O., writes:

"I have taken your paper ever since the first year of its issue. I bid you God speed in the noble work."

J. D. Beard, Avalon, Mo., writes:

"The church has fallen so far below her duty in her works of charity and love that thousands to-day have to seek these evil and worldly societies for that communion, sympathy and fellowship which they have vainly sought for in the church. . . . It appears to me a greater duty to labor for a reformation in the church, or in other words to pull the beam out of our own eyes that we may see clearly to cast the mote out of our brother's eye; and when the name Christian carries the influence that it should, wherever the name of Christ is known there will the foundation fall from under these time-serving institutions, and they will fall to pieces."

"Although we do not see things exactly as this brother does, we know many Christians should be more charitable than they now are. If the beam is in your eye, dear reader, cast it out.

Henry W. Steele, Canton, Dacotah Ter., writes:

"If there are any among the friends that are sending money for the relief of the suffering in body (of which those that it is intended for get but little, for this is done under our eyes where we can see it, and what we say we know) if they would send a few copies of the Cynosure to the poor who are not able to pay for it this year, but are anxious to read the truths it advocates, and are hungry for it, I would send the names to any who would be glad to do so. The devil has his agent at work in town putting up a Masonic hall."

Robert Armstrong, Jersey City, N. J., writes of the Cynosure:

"It ought to be in every family. I will try to extend its circulation. Praying for the divine blessing to crown with success your endeavors in opposition to every anti-Christian society or system, and in favor of every scriptural reform in church and state, I remain yours sincerely."

A missionary at Waitsburg, Wash. Ter., writes:

"Times are exceedingly hard, and I am scarcely able to keep my family above actual want. . . I am reluctantly compelled to stop my paper as I see no immediate prospect of meeting the amount already due. . . I pledge you the honor of a Christian brother, and one to whom the anti-secrecy cause is very dear, that I will meet my liabilities with your office as soon as possible, and also renew my subscription." (Six dollars and thirty-two cents would pay arrears and put this friend's subscription forward one year.)

J. W. Cole, Antwerp, N. Y., writes:

"We Anti-masons have been sleeping while the enemy have been sowing tares. I rejoice to see a waking up on this subject. Let the light shine through your excellent paper. We very much need a few lecturers to stir the people to set the ball in motion. I would be very glad to have the State Lecturer, brother Barlow, come this way."

Moses Pettingill, Peoria, Ill., writes:

"I called to see a merchant on busines since my return from our State meeting. When he remarked: 'You have got home from the Chicago convention.' I replied in the affirmative, when he said: 'I am glad we have one man that is not afraid to speak out,' meaning on Masonry."

It really does not help ones reputation to be a coward or a traitor to intelligent convictions.

The Sabbath School.

Lesson for February 14, 1875.—Ebal and Gerizim.

Joshua viii. 30-35.

COMMIT TO MEMORY, v. 34, 35.

PARALLEL PASSAGES.—Deut. xxvii. 3-8; also, v. 12.

SCRIPTURE READINGS.—On "mount Ebal," v. 30, read Deut. xi. 29; on the "altar," v. 31, see Ex. xx. 25; on the "offerings," v. 31, see Ex. xxiv. 5; on the "copy," v. 32, see Deut. xvii. 18; on the "blessings and curses," see Deut. xi. 26-30; on the reading, see Deut. xxxi. 11-13; and on the hearers of the reading, see Ezra's plan, Neh. viii.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing.

According to the directions of Moses, in Deut. xxvii. 1-11, the following steps were to be solemnly taken:

1. "Great stones," covered with such substance as would retain letters, were to be set up, inscribed with the law, or portions of it, so soon as the people had had possession of the land. This would mark the land and people as belonging to the Lord, as well as familiarize the people with the divine will. Deut. xxviii. 2, 3. Mount Ebal is named as a place for this arrangement (v. 4).

2. An altar for burnt offerings is to be set up, of unhewn stones. Peace offerings were also to be offered on it, and the people were to rejoice before the Lord. They owed the land to the divine mercy; and they were to be, as a covenant people, "glad in the Lord" (v. 5-7)

3. They were to be divided into two portions, one on mount Ebal, the other on Gerizim; the blessings of obedience and the curses on disobedience, were to be rehearsed, and all the people were, by loud acclaim, to accept these solemn sanctions of the law. It was a public, popular covenanting with God (v. 12-14).

Now, "according to all that God commanded by Moses so did Joshua. Let us see his course and its meaning.

Assuming that this solemn act was done after the fall of Ai, when Israel was once more full of courage, and the Canaanites proportionately depressed, when, though the Canaanites had not all been conquered, yet the Jordan had been crossed and the subjugation begun (Deut. xxvii. 2-4), the people are in the right temper for once more, pledging themselves to the Lord, and placing themselves and the land in covenant with him.

Ebal and Gerizim, divided by a valley seven or eight hundred yards wide, rise about eight hundred feet each. The tribes crowd the hills, in equal divisions, and the ark and the priests are between, in the valley. What a congregation! and how admirably placed for seeing, hearing, feeling, and being impressed!

Among many lessons for us, note these:

(a) Our covenant with God, once made, can be often renewed, in ways of course, of God's appointment. So the Lord's Supper gives opportunity. Coming of age, quitting school, entering college, going into a new position, home, or condition, are fit occasions for solemnly giving ourselves again to the Lord (Ps. cxvi. 7-9).

(b) He is the gracious but Almighty Lord who leads us to this and prescribes the terms. We make no terms with him. We submit and accept (Rom. x. 3.)

(c) We must go in the order of Joshua's course: (1) the altar and the sacrifice, for the sake of which we are received (Heb. ix. 12); and, (2) the giving of ourselves to him to keep his law, which we own to be just and (3) getting instruction evermore from his law (Ps. cxix. 9, 33).

(d) All that God gives us we should consecrate, with ourselves, to him, openly, publicly, and in concert. (See Ps. cxvi. 18, 19)

(e) We may, and ought to learn from this passage, that true religion is always the same in its nature and practical effect on men, however its forms may vary. God comes in grace. He takes men into union with him. He acts in mercy. He forgives their sin; but this is no warrant to them to continue in sin, or to think lightly of it. Any religion that makes sin a light thing, or encourages men to live in it is unscriptural.

And if we wish to strive with success against sin, let us be in covenant with God. Pardon first through God's mercy, then purity through the same mercy. We do not labor by ourselves to become pure, to "grow good," and then go for pardon. All such labor is lost.

And if we wish to prove ourselves of the true Israel, let us walk in God's law. "For the grace of God that bringeth salvation hath appeared to all men. Teaching us that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world" (Titus ii. 11, 12)

CENTRAL TRUTH.—Righteousness exalts and sin degrades a people.

SUGGESTIVE TOPICS.—The instructions of Moses—where contained—when to be obeyed—the place—the peculiarity of the altar—its purpose—the writing of the law—the use of the plastered stones—the two mounts—their height—the valley between—the tribes on one—on the other—what plan of selection—probable design—how Joshua obeyed—what first—principle of—next—the curses responded to—meaning of the act—how much it expressed—the lessons to us—how we can renew our covenant to be the Lord's—when it should be done—in what spirit we should do it—to what we bind ourselves—and all we have consecrated, with ourselves, to him.—Sunday-School World.

Chinese Masonry.

[From the Anti-masonic Review, 1839.]

MR EDITOR: I do not suppose that our Masonic friends are murderers, nor that they respect Masonry the more because its penalties are tortures and blood. My idea is, that so vast a power as that which is given to this association by its secrecy and imposing show, makes it a dangerous thing; and that such a power, so easily turned to mischief in the hands of bad men, or in times of excited passion, ought not to exist, when there is no necessity for it. And I challenge Masons to show any necessity for the existence of their institution, or any good to be accomplished by it, which Christianity or even common humanity, would not attain just as well.

Its dangerous character arises from that which, in the judgment of all Masons gives it being and worth, its secrecy. This, and not the mode of working in the lodge-room, identifies Masonry with the ancient mysteries of Eleusis, the Bona Dea, &c. And this renderes it pertinent to the trial of Freemasonry, to bring evidence of the course of other secret associations.

With this view I send you an extract from the Report of the English Mission College at Malacca, showing the spirit of an association, which so far as I can learn by inquiry, may be properly called Chinese Freemasonry. Probably some learned Masons can tell whether the San Ho Hwuy is in fellowship with Hindu, Mohammedan, and Christian Freemasonry or not.

THE EXTRACT.

"The other two young men who have left the college, since last year, are both native of China, and were honorably spoken of in our last report. They had not completed their second year in the institution, when, according to their own solemn and often repeated declarations, they were driven to a settlement by a fraternity of Chinese called the San Ho Hwuy, the objects of which are not clearly ascertained, but which are regarded as mischievous by the Chinese in these parts, who do not belong to the society. These two young men, it appears, had given mortal offense to the brotherhood, by assisting a friend whose life was sought by them, in making his escape from Malacca. One of them, however, being famed for his skill in wielding the sword, and the other having acquired considerable knowledge of English, objects of some importance to the fraternity, they were offered a pardon, provided they would take the oaths, and become members of the society. They however, according to their own testimony, would not on any consideration enter the society, and were consequently threatened with death.

Some time after this, their sleeping room was broken into at night, most of their little property carried off, and one of themselves wounded by fellows in disguise, We then gave them a room in the college house, but they declared that they could not put out their heads at night, without endangering their lives; nor could we by any arguments induce them to remain in Malacca. This fact affords an additional proof of the pernicious objects of the San Ho Society."

It does not at all surprise us that thorough-going secret society journals should speak as does the Freemason "Bauhuette." We quote its words from the Iowa Kirchenblatt, as follows: "If we would be true Freemasons and promote the object to which we have pledged ourselves, we must without reserve and hesitation proclaim the words of Strauss and express them aloud as our own: 'We are no longer Christians; we are simply Freemasons, nothing more and nothing less.'" That is honest, at any rate. It is well that the world should know where such societies stand. And yet there are some Christians who still dream that they can without inconsistency belong to such infidel associations.—Lutheran Standard.

THE ENVY OF BIGOTRY.—In the reign of Abdallah the Third, there was a great drought at Bagdad. The Mohammedan doctors issued a decree that the prayers of the faithful should be offered up for rain; the drought continued. The Jews were then permitted to add their prayers to those of the true believers. The supplications of both were ineffectual; as famine stared them in the face, those dogs, the Christians, were at length enjoined also to pray. It so happened that t rrents of rain immediately followed. The whole Conclave, with the Mufti at their head, were now as indignant at the cessation of the drought as they were before alarmed at its continuance. Some explanation was necessary to the people, and holy convocation was held; the members of it came to this unanimous determination: that the God of their Prophet was highly gratified by the prayers of the faithful; that they were as incense and as sweet-smelling savors unto him; and that he refused their requests that he might prolong the pleasure of listening to their supplications; but that the prayers of those Christian infidels were an abomination to the Deity, and that he granted their petitions the sooner to get rid of their loathsome importunities.—C. Colton.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEB. 5, 1875.

Our National Executive Committee meeting next Saturday (Feb. 6th), 148 Madison Street, rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, is very important. The subject of a National Printing House and Mr. Carpenter's proposition will come up for action; and the next anniversary at Pittsburgh will be considered. All the friends of the cause, women as well as men, who may find time and inclination to attend, and consult with us, will be welcomed as advisory members. Some of our meetings are eminently practical and profoundly interesting. Come and see.

While popular sentiment almost always ultimately comes right, nothing is more shallow than the facility with which it imposes on itself, or is imposed on for a time. Some wiseacre fancied and said that Tilton's prosecution of Beecher was probably a ruse or a sham, and the press echoed "sham-m-m." By the same many-mouthed monster, Gladstone's first indictment of the Pope for treason against England was pronounced a bid to the Protestants for a new lease of power. But Beecher's trial is filling the land with its bruit; and Gladstone has formally retired from politics. Thus the cry of the press is often as light and migatory as while, at other times, armed and impelled by some great, over-bearing truth, it is loud as Niagara and resistless as its flood.

"The watch-dog's voice that bays the passing wind,"

ARREARS OF BLOOD.

It would seem that there is something more than popular superstition to cause the after desolation of houses where unpunished murders are known to have been committed. When the first man born into the world murdered the second, God said to him: "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground." And it was a doctrine in the Hebrew Commonwealth that blood, unavenged, "defiled the land," and that the execution of justice alone could cleanse it. The same was held true of idolatry, for when men cut loose from the true God, and practice self-projected worships for religion there is no justice; nothing but cunning and might, priests and tyrants. Of course such lands are defiled. These causes have brought back the owls to hoot and jackals to scream over the once fertile fields of Eastern civilization.

In 1734 or 5 I attended a convention of abolition lecturers got up by the Tappans in the city of New York. It held two weeks, during which we were invited to dine with an old colored woman who had paid several thousand dollars to purchase herself, her family, and many of her fellow slaves from bondage. There were some fifty or sixty of us invited, Weld, Stanton, Beriah Green, Yates of Albany, and Dr. Beeman of Troy, among the number. It was a new thing for white men to dine out with black people, and though no negroes sat at table with us, the honor which the stalwart and wonderful woman felt we were doing her house filled her with an ecstasy bordering on inspiration; and while she and her small army of colored servants and attendants waited on us as we sat at her luxuriously spread table, she poured forth vollies of rude eloquence the like of which I had never and have never since heard.

"I see," she exclaimed with a vehemence which shook almost the dishes on the table, "I see what these white folks is doin. De South is like one great ole graveyard, where murdered ones is buried all ober it in de long forgotten graves, and dey is guine to dig open all graves of slavery and bring all the dark crimes to light."

It is this blood guiltiness which now vexes the South, and justice only can heal it. The following view lately given by the poet Whittier, seems just and confirmatory of the above doctrine:

"Who does not now see what the wise statesmanship of Charles Sumner clearly discerned at the time, the error of investing so hastily the revolted South with state sovereignty, which neither black nor white were in a condition to exercise with safety to themselves or the Union! Under territorial government neither Ku-Klux nor White Leagues, nor the abuse of the black man's confidence by unprincipled adventurers, would have been possible, and we should have been spared the precedent of the United States troops settling questions of membership in the legislature of a sovereign State. The past is beyond recall; but the right of Congress to secure to Louisiana what she has not had since the Rebellion, a republican form of government, remains.

THE LOCUSTS OF THE LODGE.

Readers of the Old Testament scriptures need not be told that religion underlies every public interest; and that what is there called "forsaking the Lord," which was no more nor less than practicing man invented worships, is the one all-pervading cause of the ruin of the old nations. It is obvious and easy to see how and why nations that practice that dance of idiots, a man-contrived religion, lose all public virtue and swamp the public good. For, once cut loose from God by substituting false worships for the true, laws are without sanction; their courts without the oath; their rulers without conscience, and their people without rights. But such philosophizing dwindles into nothing beside the express declaration of the Bible that, "The nation and kingdom which will not serve God shall perish."

In the light of these Scriptures, how dreadful must be the fate which impends over our land, which has a lodge of spurious worships in every little hamlet, and hosts of them in the larger towns and cities of the United States? As naturalists account for the burning of Sodom and Gomorrah by the lightning igniting the bitumen of the soil, so there are natural causes producing the political hell which prevails in many portions of the South, where, it is well known, a Christless Freemasonry has long held the Christian religion by the throat, and the civil administration has lost its influence over mind, because its only power is the sneaking secret, power of the ring. Monarchs may tax men, but monarchy is local and limited. Its sword is visible and can be measured. But who can know the length of the daggers of midnight assassins? or who sound the bottomless gulf of their greed? Princes and nobles may become numerous and burden the exchequer; but the titularies of the lodge are legion. The price of their Christless temples, their mock-regalia and Belshazzar carousals, draws more from the hard earnings of labor in this country than God's armies of devouring insects which he lets loose to punish our impiety and teach us our dependence. And they resemble those pests, also, in the darkness of their origin, the rapidity of their increase, and the terror they inspire. No man knows or can know when or where they will strike him. In a moral as the Hebrew prophet says of the locust armies in a literal sense, "The land is as the garden of Eden before them; behind them a desolate wilderness." The secret armies eat out the flowers, fruitage and verdure of our free, open, civil, social and rel gious institutions; and, as in Spain, France, Mexico, and other rite-ridden countries, leave nothing for their fragrance but the stench of their own decay. May God give us grace to heed our dangers and escape them while we may.

SABBATH MAIL SERVICE IN NEW YORK.

A recent attempt to secularize the Sabbath and its failure is described by Rev. J. C. K. Milligan, editor of Our Banner in the Statesman:

The delivery of letters on Sabbath, January 3, took very many by surprise; having had but slight notice by a part of the daily press. But at once it awakened wide dissatisfaction and open indignation. The carriers were forbidden by large numbers to leave letters on the Sabbath day. Even a Roman Catholic priest refused to receive his letters, and told the carrier that of all the recent attempts which the devil had made to overturn Christianity, this one would be received with the least favor, and would react with tremendous force against the infidelity and irreligion which he was seeking to establish in its stead. And he was right.

The carriers generally were indignant, feeling that the order enslaved them, taking away their day of rest and enjoyment with their families; and some of them, who prized the religious privileges of the day, gave notice of resignation. The post-office officials, very many of them whom were subjected to additional labor in consequence of the order, protested against it. But Christian men with wonderful unanimity denounced it as an outrage upon Christianity, a needless desecration of the Lord's day, and an unfair discrimination in favor of a small coterie of infidels, and against the overwhelming majority who regard the day as more or less sacred, and by divine command secluded from secular labors.

Providentially, the profanation occurred on the first day of the Week of Prayer. In many of the meetings for prayer, in the various churches, it was discussed and almost unanimously condemned in strong terms. Earnest prayers were offered that God would rebuke the wickedness, and make the wrath of man to praise him in awakening greater regard for the Sabbath and bringing all to observe it in nearer conformity to the divine law. Letters were poured in upon the post-master protesting against the outrage, and influential Christian citizens made their personal appeals to him to retrace his steps. With one consent Christian men seemed roused to denounce the act, as they met in the street cars and their places of business, and took occasion to express their mind to the post-office officials in the general office, and at the sub-stations; and measures were being taken for a public indignation meeting. So clearly was the public sentiment expressed in these private ways, that before the week closed, the post-master discovered his blunder and, without waiting for any public demonstration, made haste to annul his order.

NOTES.

—The Wisconsin State meeting is postponed one week. It will be held February 23. Let there be a rally at Delevan on that day. See notice on 4th page.

—Sheridan's "banditti" dispatch has aroused the hearty hatred of the New Orleans people, who are of the same nature still as when Butler undertook their management during the war. They boast that they never forgive an insult, which they consider the dispatch, and on every occasion vent their bitterness. Sheridan is caricatured in the show windows, at the theaters, in the hotels, everywhere. Parts of his dispatches are hissed as he passes, or prominently displayed in various ways; yet he is not ruffled in the least by the abuse, probably thinking oderint dum metuant—Let them hate if only they will fear.

—Rev. D. S. Kinney, of Perrine, Pa., has been appointed by the Wesleyan Book Committee as the successor of the late Rev. A. Crooks as Publishing Agent of the Wesleyan Book Concern and Treasurer of the Missionary Association. He has accepted and is already at work in his new duties with energy and zeal that promises to maintain the well-earned credit of the Publishing House. By the new arrangement Bro. L. N. Stratton is sole editor of the American Wesleyan.

—A week or two since it was stated in our news columns that A. A. Phelps was elected chairman of the Illinois Senate. It should have been A. A. Glenn, a prominent Mason and member of the Grand R. A. Chapter of this State. In a communication to that body he speaks of a person, lately dead, as having entered "the sanctuary or Holy of Holies, to find the rest prepared from the foundation of the world," and of "his making a pilgrimage to the Holy Land in 1868, and there, before the shrine of our departed Saviour, renewing his vows." Such "stuff" is not a complimentary exhibition of intelligence or candor to say the least.

—The Religious Telescope says of the speakers at the approaching convention at Mansfield, Ohio:

"At the anti-secrecy convention in Mansfield, Ohio, the 17th and 18th of February, we have the assurance of the attendance of several distinguished speakers with well-prepared addresses. Bishop J. Weaver, of Dayton, and President H. H. George, of West Geneva College, are to address the meeting on the evening of Feb. 17th, President Fairchild, of Oberlin College, will be one of the speakers the evening of the 18th. There is little reason to doubt that this will be one of the most interesting meetings in opposition to secret societies ever held in this State.

—Bro. W. F. Manley's earnest monthly, The Christian Pilgrim, has removed its publication office to Sycamore, Ill., under the care of Baker and Arnold, publishers of the Free Methodist. A "Royal Arch Mason" is writing for its columns an experience of twelve years in the lodge.

—Friends in Iowa will notice the meeting at Tipton, on the 16th inst. Make an effort to be present.

—Capt. Bundy, a well-known Christian worker of Chicago, dropped a bombshell into the noon prayer-meeting at the Y. M. C. A. rooms the other day. There would have been no explosion, however, if Major J. H. Cole had not tried to knock it out doors with a sledge-hammer. Bro. Bundy is a member of Rev. D. P. Baker's church (Free-Methodist) and loves the service of Christ heartily, and as thoroughly hates all things that come from the pit. Several times he has alluded to the lodge in the noon meeting, and on the occasion mentioned, the subject gave an opportunity of urging Christians to separate themselves from all entanglements of the world. Christian business men, said he, you should give up your Masonry, your secret lodges, with the other ensnaring works of the flesh. Major Cole, who is general director of the noon meetings, here promptly called the speaker to order as introducing controversy against the rules. Bro. Bundy replied that the Bible said that we must come out from such associations and be separate. Mr. Cole still persisted in the order and some confusion followed, when a gentleman, name unknown to us, arose and re-affirmed the sentiment and briefly and eloquently proved from the Scriptures the necessity of Christian separation from the lodge. Capt. Bundy afterward replied to the objectors that it was not controversy he brought in; for no Mason had, or would dare publicly to stand for the lodge. Thus the light spreads and the truth maintains its course.

JOHN TODD, D. D.—The letters of this eminent clergyman and author to the Amherst students on the subject of secret societies was published some weeks since. A brief sketch of his life though late will yet be interesting. He was born in Rutland, Vt., Oct. 9th, 1800. He graduated at Yale College in 1822, and at Andover Theological Seminary four years later. In 1827 he was ordained pastor of the Congregational church of Groton, Mass. He was called to the Edwards Church in Northampton in 1833, and to Philadelphia in 1836, from whence he remained until death. Dr. Todd was one of the founders of Mt. Holyoke Seminary and was interested in other educational institutions. He was best known through his various books on religious and social topics, all of which are marked for their practical good sense. Few works by American authors have had so wide circulation as some of his. His "Lectures to Children" have been translated into French, German, Greek, Dutch and Tamil, and several times reprinted in Great Britain; two editions of the 'Student's Manual" have been made in France, and 150,000 copies were sold in England before 1855. He died in Pittsfield about a year ago.

Obituary.

It is a sad duty to record this week the death of three clergymen who have long been known as earnest endorsers and workers in our reform.

The first is GEORGE TRASK, the well-known opponent of tobacco, who died of heart disease last week at his home in Fitchburg, Mass. Mr. Trask was an original reformer, verily raised up of God to attack almost single-handed the great vice of tobacco-using. He commenced life a shoemaker, and when he became of age opened a hardware store which provided him money to pass through a college course at Brunswick, Me. He afterward entered the ministry and served several churches in Massachusetts. While thus employed he became personally acquainted with the wide-spread evils of tobacco-using, and also with the traffic, which at one time was considerable in the Connecticut Valley, and called forth a strong protest from the Evangelist Potter who preached up and down the valley against the tobacco barns. The latter years of Mr. Trask's life were almost wholly devoted to this reform. He published pungent tracts and the Anti-Tobacco Journal and lectured as he had an opportunity. In the great Boston fire of 1872 all of the plates of his tracts were destroyed, and he had already in part replaced them. The manner in which he began this reform he thus himself describes:

I was a victim of tobacco twenty years and more. Twenty years ago (written in 1870) I had become emaciated, tremulous, and cowardly, and physicians said I was at the gates of death. I abandoned this poison. The act was an epoch in my life. It was a battle, but I called upon God and resolved, live or die, I would conquer this 'unclean devil,' and it was done. Its renunciation lifted a loathsome incubus from my soul. . . . . All aglow as a young convert I began to talk to my tobacco-using neighbors. I soon began to lecture near and afar and circulated the pledge, and my labors in Sabbath-schools, in all schools, were attended with flattering success.

The success of his labors only the last day will fully make known. But we know that in spite of the statements of his aspersers, great progress has been made in public sentiment and especially in religious bodies, many ministerial associations and churches regarding the use of tobacco as an evil only second, if not equal to that of spirituous liquors. And this belief is so thoroughly impressed that it is impossible the good work begun with such faith and self-sacrifice on the part of an individual shall ever be given up. God will raise up a successor.

JAMES M. Y. SMITH, pastor of the 37th Street Methodist Church in New York, while conducting services in his church was taken suddenly ill and carried to his home where he died January 21st. His last words were, "Father, thine, thine!" Bro. Smith came to this country from England where he had been active in Christian labor as a Wesleyan evangelist. He resided after coming to America for a time in New York, and afterward in Chicago, where he was employed in erecting stone fronts for business blocks and residences, part of the time as contractor. He was afterwards, when in the ministry, at times obliged to resort to his old trade for support, and it is said Potter Parmer offered him high wages to superintend in the construction of his mammoth hotel. After he became connected with the Free Methodist church, he was stationed at Marengo. While here he attended the Boone County Anti-masonic Convention, held in Belvidere, September, 1870, and made an earnest address. His next charge was in this city, where he co-operated with the friends of our cause, and preached a series of sermons against Freemasonry in his church. Aurora, was his next appointment. He here assisted Rev. L. Bailey in conducting the Free Methodist. At the last conference of his church, he was transferred to a new charge in New York, but continued and severe sickness prevented his proceeding to his field for some weeks, where after a short time he has been called home. He will be remembered long as a fearless, eloquent, self-sacrificing laborer for Christ.

I. H. TACKETT.—From a notice in the Reformer and Free Press we learn that this aged seceding Methodist Episcopal minister and seceding Mason died recently at his home in Forestville, N. Y. The notice says:

He, like multitudes of others, became entangled in the meshes of secretism, by the alluring cries of an increase of usefulness, but some years ago grace set him free from the dark delusion, and lying trap of Freemasonry, and nobly did he bear his testimony against the dark orders. At our last county convention he declared with emphasis and solemnity, that the revelations of Mr. Morgan were exactly as he received them.

Being a superannuate of the Erie Conference, he joined with others in passing the resolutions warning the young men to keep clear of the lodge. He oft declared to the writer that since the commencement of the present agitation, many things have been made plain that were dark to him since he left the lodge. He embraced the first favorable opportunity to make a public renunciation, and there was no backsliding in his testimony.

Religious Intelligence.

—Sunday evening meetings are now held in Farwell Hall, conducted by B. F. Jacobs, one of the most prominent and active lay workers of Chicago. A meeting for inquirers is held after the preaching.

—The Missionary Committee of the United Presbyterian church has issued an appeal for a Jamaica Jubilee Fund. This church has a mission at Jamiaca with 26 principal stations, 96 out-stations, 21 ordained missionaries, 12 colporteurs, 54 teachers and 5,572 communicants, and have spent $926,000 on the work. The oldest station is now fifty years old and it is proposed to signalize the jubilee year by raising a fund for the training of native ministers.

—The evangelization of nations is not a hopeless undertaking, as the present condition and prospects of missions abundantly proves. It really began only about three-fourths of a century ago. It began in the face of much opposition. But, now, more than 1,800 missionaries have been sent out from different Christian nations, at a yearly expense of over $5,000,000. There are 1,500 Bible societies in different parts of the world, organized since 1804. These have issued more than 135,000,000 copies of the sacred Word, and in various languages. Never, even in Apostolic times, has more energy been shown in the work, and never have there been such results in the history of the world.

—One of the deacons in the Second Baptist Church of Chicago started a mission Sabbath school in the south-western part of the city in 1866 which soon grew into a flourishing church. During the four and a half years he labored with this mission, the deacon was never absent, though he walked 7 miles each Sabbath, 1528 miles in all, to reach the school. He also contributed during that time to the mission $1,320.

—The Presbyterian Synod of China contains fifty-one native ministers, thirteen of whom are ordained, seven licentiates, and seventeen candidates. During the past year 223 adult members were added to the churches, which have now an aggregate membership of 1,093, half of whom are women. They have forty schools under the synod, in which are gathered 390 boys and 303 girls. The synod has twenty-one organized churches, twenty-seven missionaries, and fifty-seven chapels.

—Rev. Dr. Wisner who has been pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Lockport, N. Y., has been retired on a life salary of $1,500.

—In the First Congregational Church of this city there were 109 additions during last year, 45 being by profession. The Sunday-school had an average attendance of 597 during the year. The present membership of the church is 934, ranking second or third among the churches of that denomination in the country.

—The home missionaries of Kansas, Nebraska and Dakota report considerable destitution in the devastated counties. The loss from grasshoppers falls heavily on new church enterprises, which must wait or be carried on with help from other sections.

—A new United Presbyterian church was dedicated recently in St. Louis. Pres. Wallace, of Monmouth College, preached the dedicatory sermon and was assisted in the other services by Dr. Guthrie, of Sparta, Ill.

—The United Presbyterian Memorial church of this city is prospering under the labors of Pastor Bain. Two of his discourses, "Is Christianity adapted to the need of Mankind?" and "Does Prof. Swing give the true cause of infidelity of the present day?" have been published by request. In December eighteen were added to the church.

—Rev. D. B. Douglass, Wesleyan conference evangelist in western New York, a well known and faithful laborer in the anti lodge reform and a leader in the Niagara Co. Association, has been stricken with paralysis.

—The Pittsburgh Advocate reports extensive revivals in West Virginia conference. Nearly 300 conversions are reported.

—The committees of conference on the part of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian churches, have held a session in Baltimore, and adjourned without agreeing upon a basis for the establishment of fraternal relations.

—The West Texas M. E. Conference have ordained three Mexican converts and established a Mexican border mission for them to work in.

—There are three Methodist centers in Salt Lake city. The Central Church, Rev. C. C. Stratton, pastor, has a membership of one hundred and twelve and a Sabbath-school numbering two hundred and fifty.

—The Telescope argues forcibly for the introduction of the United Brethren church into the South. The principles of this church and the fearlessness with which its preachers generally maintain them are such a gospel leaven as the South needs. A home missionary society to further this object will enter upon a blessed work.

—Bishop Dickson reports the following statistics in the Telescope of the East Mississippi District of the United Brethren church: number of organized churches, 1,025; members, 35,782; missionary collections, $6,905.15; church expenses, $59,688 90; church buildings, 450; Sabbath-schools, 710; scholars, 28,564; centennary collections, $51,203; total collections for all purposes, $184,895. The Bishop reports a harmonious and spiritual feeling in the conferences of the district, but thinks the minister's salaries inadequate.

The Prayer of The Destitute.

"He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and will not despise their prayer." Ps. 1. 17.

My land lies fallow; Master, till me!
My heart lies empty; Master fill me!
It plays the traitor; Master win me!
It faints, it dies! Put new life in me!
It goes astray; good Shepherd lead me!
It sighs for hunger; come and feed me!
It is so poor! Oh, give me riches!
It is corrupt; O Lord renew me!
So ignorant! Oh wilt thou teach me!
Has wandered far. But thou can'st reach me!
Is sore diseased; Physician, heal me!
Exposed to danger; Oh, conceal me!
It trembles! In thine arms, oh, fold me!
Begins to sink! O Savior, hold me!
Is sinking fast! Lord look upon me!
So cold and dark! Oh, shine upon me!
A poor lost sinner! Come and find me!
A rebel! May thy love now bind me!
A prodigal! wilt thou receive me?
A beggar! Oh, wilt thou relieve me?
A backslider! Wilt thou restore me!
Unholy! May thy presence awe me!
Unfit for life! O God, prepare me!
So weak! On eagles' wings, oh bear me!
So comfortless! Lord Jesus, cheer me!
So lonely! God of love draw near me!
By sin accursed! Good Lord acquit me!
Unfit for heaven's pure service! Fit me!
Unfit for work on earth! But use me!
A suppliant! Do not thou refuse me!
Oh, come and fill the hungry with good things;
For thou hast all I need, thou King of kings!

Religious Cant.

In these days of enlarged thoughts and increased activities, very many things are still done in the name of religion, that shock both the moral and the common sense. The Bible standard of excellence is very high, "Be ye therefore perfect." Matt. v. 48. "Provide things honest in the sight of all men." Rom. xii. 17.

A few years ago, under the preaching of the justice of God, sinners trembled, and men hastened to make confession and restitution, fearing the anger of an offended God.

Now-a-days, infinite mercy is proclaimed, and unrepented sinners walk into the chief seats at church, and the cry comes up from hungry souls that the church and the pulpit have lost their power.

Zealous, well-meaning young persons, shoot up here and there and rush frantically about as if expecting the instantaneous conversion of the world. They usually soon want to borrow $5.00, and in their exit do immeasurably more harm to thinking minds, than all the good they ever did.

We have also the spectacle of successful Christian workers squandering money given them for the Lord's work, but utterly failing to pay the debts they have contracted, or to provide for those dependent upon them; of clergymen borrowing and never repaying; of business men squandering trust funds and the credit of a good name in reckless financial ventures and then rushing to prayer-meeting to have the Lord and their friends save them from their own criminal stupidity, calling it the mysterious dispensation of Providence; of men who having run to the end of their financial rope, talk now of putting their trust in the Lord—wife—children—business and all; of Satan's best servants, who under the mantle of religion, rush to the noon prayer-meeting or any successful Christian effort, make prompt prayers and smart speeches, while they are corrupt in thoughts and impure in practice; who by their very presence drive away sincere, intelligent workers who know their true character.

How all this looks to the moral business man. He works hard for what he has and lives economically; his word is as good as his note and his word or note were never dishonored. He says:

"My parents trusted God and I want to serve him with all my powers, but if I must go with this man, and try to put on a religion that is nothing, if not sensational; that is, a saint at church a sinner in business, I will have none of it. When I can find the spirit of the martyrs, who read the Holy Bible as God's Word, although to have it known were certain death: when the pulpit puts aside glittering generalities, and gushing sentamentalities, and honors God's holy law by meeting out justice to the rebellious, and mercy only to the penitent; when I can get a religion that will go all through the life and soul purifying in everything; then I will join the army of the Lord and work with all my heart to save the lost in this sad, suffering, sinning world. Until then nothing but the faith I have in my mother's Saviour, keeps me from saying, the moralist is better than the church professor and the theater than the church."

As Christian workers, the task is to save a lost world by the Cross of Christ.

It is not our work but the Master's. Let us take our eyes from the imperfect man and set them on Jesus, the perfect one, and when discouragements arise let us remember that all through this broad land are hidden thousands of faithful, patient, praying workers, who with frugality and industry earn their daily bread and with personal efforts and prayer win multitudes for heaven.—Selected.

John Locke.

John Locke, a very celebrated philosopher, and one of the greatest men England ever produced, was born in the year 1632. He was well educated; and applying himself with vigor to his studies, his mind became enlarged, and stored with much useful knowledge. He went abroad as secretary to the English embassador at several of the German courts; and afterwards had the offer of being made envoy at the court of the emperor, or of any other that he chose; but he declined the proposal on account of the infirm state of his health.

He was a commissioner of trade and plantations, in which station he very honorably distinguished himself. Notwithstanding his public employments, he found leisure to write much for the benefit of mankind. His "Essay on the Human Understanding," his "Discourses on Government," and his "Letters on Toleration," are justly held in high estimation.

This enlightened man and profound reasoner, was most firmly attached to the Christian religion. His zeal to promote it appeared, first, in his middle age, by publishing a discourse to demonstrate the reasonableness of believing Jesus to be the promised Messiah; and, afterwards, in the latter part of his life, by a very judicious Commentary on several of the Epistles of the Apostle Paul.

The sacred Scriptures are everywhere mentioned by him with the greatest reverence; and he exhorts Christians "to betake themselves in earnest to the study of the way to salvation, in those holy writings, wherein God has revealed it from heaven, and proposed it to the world; seeking our religion where we are sure it is in truth to be found, comparing spiritual things with spiritual."

In a letter written the year before his death, to a person who asked this question, "What is the shortest and surest way for a young man to attain a true knowledge of the Christian religion?" he says: "Let him study the Holy Scriptures, especially the New Testament. Therein are contained the words of eternal life. It has God for its author; salvation for its end; and truth, without any mixture of error, for its matter."

This advice was comformable to his own practice. "For fourteen years he applied himself in an especial manner, to the study of the Scriptures, and employed the last years of his life hardly in anything else. He was never weary of admiring the great views of that sacred book, and the just relation of all its parts; he every day made discoveries in it, that gave him fresh cause of admiration."

The consolation which he derived from divine revelation, is forcibly expressed in these words: "I gratefully receive and rejoice in the light of revelation, which has set me at rest in many things, the manner whereof my poor reason can by no means make out to me."

After he had diligently employed a great part of his life in a variety of occupations, he chose a pleasing retirement for the remainder of his days. This leisure appears to have been productive of solid improvement by enabling him to look calmly over the scenes of past life; to form a proper estimate of its enjoyments; and to dedicate himself more fully to the cause of piety and virtue.

The summer before his death, he began to be very sensible of his approaching dissolution. He often spoke of it, and always with great composure. A short time before his decease he declared to a friend that "he was in the sentiments of perfect charity towards all men; and of a sincere union with the church of Christ, under whatever name distinguished."

The day before his death, Lady Masham being alone with him, and sitting by his bedside, he exhorted her to regard this world only as a state of preparation for a better; adding that "he had lived long enough, and thanked God for having passed his days so comfortably; but that this life appeared to him mere vanity." His meaning, in this last expression, doubtless was that the duration and enjoyment of this life are as nothing, compared with the endless ages, and the supreme felicity of the life which is to come.

The same day he particularly advised all about him to read the Scriptures; and desired to be remembered by them at evening prayers. Being told that if he chose it, the whole family should be with him in his chamber, he said, he should be very glad to have it so, if it would not give too much trouble; and an occasion offering to speak of the goodness of God, he especially exalted the care which God showed to man in justifying him by faith in Jesus Christ; and in particular, returned God thanks, for having blessed him with the knowledge of the Divine Saviour.

About two months before his death, he wrote a letter to his friend, Anthony Collins, and left his directions upon it. "To be delivered to him after my decease." He concludes with the following remarkable words:

"May you live long and happy, in the enjoyment of health, freedom, content, and all those blessings which Providence has bestowed on you, and to which your virtue entitles you. You loved me living, and will preserve my memory when I am dead. All the use to be made of it is, that this life is a scene of vanity which soon passes away and affords no solid satisfaction, but in the consciousness of doing well, and in the hopes of another life. This is what I can say upon experience; and what you will find to be true, when you come to make up the account. Adieu."

The following extract from a letter written by Lady Masham, deserves a place among the testimonies respecting this distinguished and excellent man:

"You will not, perhaps, dislike to know, that the last scene of Mr. Locke's life, was not less admirable than anything else concerning him. All the faculties of his mind were perfect to the last. His weakness, of which only he died, made such gradual and visible advances, that few people, I think, do so sensibly see death approach them as he did. During all this time no one could observe the least alteration in his humor; always cheerful, conversable, civil; to the last day thoughtful of all the concerns of his friends, and omitting no fit occasion of giving Christian advice to all about him. In short, his death was, like his life, truly pious; yet natural, easy, and unaffected. Time, I think, can never produce a more eminent example of reason and religion than he was, both living and dying."

Obliteration of Memory.

But the subject of the obliteration of the records of memory under certain conditions is as curious as that of their unexpected revival. The two kinds of changes are, indeed, in some cases simultaneous; while one set of impressions is recalled, another is coincidently erased or lost. A well-known living physician not long ago recorded the case of a lady who, up to her 16th year, had lived in France, and spoke only French. After this she came to England, learned the language, married an American at 20, and for the next twenty years lived partly in America and partly in England, speaking English habitually, French scarcely ever. She then became ill, forgot her English and all about her married life, and if asked who she was, gave her maiden name, and mentioned, in French, the street in Paris in which she had lived as a girl. So completely had she forgotten her English, that it was necessary to change an English for a French maid. In some of the cases of partial loss of memory from injury or disease of the brain, it would be very puzzling to account satisfactorily for the nature and the very limited exient of the loss. Thus a fever obliterated from the memory of a learned man the letter "F," without apparently committing any other injury. A soldier who had undergone the operation of trepan, and lost a slice of brain matter, lost with it the power to recall the numbers "5" and "7," and was only able to fix them in his mind by laboriously learning them like a child. Sir Benjamin Brodie mentions the case of a groom in the service of George IV., who was kicked by a vicious horse while he was in the act of cleaning it. The groom did not fall, nor was he at all stunned or insensible; but he entirely forgot what he had been doing at the time the blow was inflicted. There was an interval of time blotted out, as it were, from his recollection. He inferred, in fact, that during that time he had been asleep. A young lady who had been present at a catastrophe in Scotland, at which many persons were killed by the fall of the gallery of a church, escaped without injury, but with the complete loss of the recollection of any of the circumstances; and this extended not only to the accident, but to everything that had occurred to her a certain time before going to the church. A gentlemen mentioned by Dr. Beattie lost his knowledge of Greek from a blow on the head, whilst the other mental stores were left intact. Sometimes, however, disease appears to make a clean sweep of all acquired knowledge of every kind. The following extraordinary case was published in an American medical work many years ago. The patient was a clergyman, who, at the termination of a severe illness, lost the recollection of everything, even the names of the most common objects. When his health was restored, he began to acquire knowledge just as a child does. After learning the names of objects, he was taught to read, and after this he began to learn the Latin language. He had made considerable progress, when, one day, in reading his lesson with his brother, who was his teacher, he suddenly stopped and put his hand to his head. Being asked why he did so, he replied: "I feel a peculiar sensation in my head; and now it appears to me that I knew all this before." From that time he rapidly recovered his faculties. It is recorded by Ballantyne of Sir Walter Scott that when the "Bride of Lammermoor" in its printed form was submitted to him, after an illness, he did not recognize as his own one single incident, character, or conversation it contained; yet the original tradition was perfect in his mind. When Mrs. Arkwright sang some verses of Sir Walter's one evening at Lord Francis Egerton's, the author of them whispered to Lockhart: "Capital words. Whose are they? Byron's, I suppose, but I don't remember them." For a voluminous author to forget some of his own writings does not appear so remarkable; but one can hardly conceive of a person failing to recollect his own name; but cases are on record of this ne plus ultra of forgetfulness. A man of not very strong intellect, who held an office the sole duty of which consisted in signing his own name to a number of papers, had one day so much business of this kind to do that at last he was incapable of recollecting the word he ought to sign. A writer of the last century relates that Mr. Von B——, Envoy at St. Petersburg, went one morning to pay a number of visits. Among other houses at which he called there was one where the servants did not know him, and consequently he was under the necessity of giving in his name; but this he found he had entirely forgotten. Turning round to a gentleman who accompanied him, he said with much earnestness: "For God's sake, tell me who I am!" This odd request excited laughter, but he insisted on being answered, adding, that he had entirely forgotten his name.—Chambers' Journal.

Children's Corner.

What Can Little Hands do?

Oh, what can little hands do
To Please the King of heaven?
The little hands some work may try
To help the poor in misery:
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little hands do
To please the King of heaven?
The little lips can praise and pray,
And gentle words of kindness say:
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little eyes do
To please the King of heaven?
The little eyes can upward look,
Can learn to read God's holy book:
Such grace to mine be given.

Oh, what can little hearts do
To please the King of heaven?
The hearts, if God his spirit send,
Can love and trust the children's Friend:
Such grace to mine be given.

Though small is all that we can do
To please the King of heaven,
When hearts and hands and lips unite
To serve the Saviour with delight,
They are most precious in his sight:
Such grace to mine be given.

Be Thankful.

I don't want any supper," said Kate. "Nothing but bread and milk, and cake—just the same every night."

"Would you like to take a walk?" asked mamma, not noticing Kate's remarks.

"Yes, mamma."

Kate was pleased so long as their walk led through pleasant streets; but when they came to narrow dirty ones, where the houses were old and poor, she wanted to go home. "Please, mamma, don't go any farther."

"We will go into the corner house," said mamma.

Some rough looking men were sitting on the doorsteps. Kate felt afraid, and held tight hold of mamma's hand; but on they went, up the tottering steps to the garret. So hot and close it was that they could scarcely breathe. On a straw bed, near the only window, lay a young girl asleep, so pale and thin and still, she looked as if she were dead.

Hearing footsteps, she opened her eyes. Mamma uncovered her basket, and gave the girl a drink of milk, and placed the bread and cake beside her.

Kate's eyes filled with tears as she saw the girl eagerly eat her supper. Not a mouthful had she tasted since early morning.

The poor mother had been away all day working, and now came home wishing she had something nice to bring her sick child. When she found her so well cared for, she could not thank mamma and Kate enough.

The supper seemed a feast to them.

"If we can keep a roof over our heads," she said, "and get a crust to eat, we are thankful."

Kate never forgot these words. Let us learn the same lesson, and cease complaining and fault-finding. If we have a home and food to eat, let us thank God, for many wander the streets homeless and hungry.—Children's Friend.

Coal.

Well, boys, what are you looking at so eagerly? Only a piece of coal, do you say, Charlie? I shouldn't suppose you could find anything worth looking at in a smutty piece of coal. Ah, well! I am glad my boys have found that only a piece of coal as Charlie calls it, is worth looking at.

I think I can tell you something about it that will make you open your eyes wider still. You know how astonished and puzzled you were the other night at the tricks of the "magic-man," who turned beans into sugar-plums, and did all sorts of things before your very eyes. Now the piece of coal is the most wonderful piece of magnet in the world. Suppose I tell you that this hard black lump once had life. Yes, boys, I am in earnest. That black lump is really one of the most wonderful things in the world. It was once a delicate little plant, turning ever to the sun, and bending and nodding with every breeze. It is almost beyond belief, and I don't wonder that you shake your heads. Many people older than you would do the same if told that the coal, to which they owe so much, and which they use quite as a matter of course, once made up great forests which covered vast areas. They know it comes somehow out of the earth, and as long as it continues to come, and doesn't cost more than so much a ton, they don't bother themselves with questions as to what it is. I have no doubt many regard it as a peculiar kind of rock. I want my boys to know better, and so let us see if we can't explain the mystery about it.

Well, then, in the first place, plants are composed principally of two gases and a substance called carbon. The gases are oxygen and hydrogen. You can easily remember the word carbon. Now, when a plant begins to decay, these two gases escape into the air, while the carbon stays and forms coal. So remember that coal is chiefly carbon, and it gets the carbon from plants.

Since it has been proved that coal does come from plants, and that our vegetation nowadays makes little or no coal, we know that when the great beds of coal were formed everything must have been specially arranged for it. The world wasn't then as it is now. It was just sky and water, with here and there patches of land. There were great marshes everywhere. Sometimes these would dry up and become dry land. Then again the sea would come rushing in over the land, and form new marshes. There were no birds in the air; no people on the land. Only reptiles and marsh-loving beasts roamed around in the soft clay. All was quiet and desolate, yet it was not a dreary time. In the marshes and on the land grew beautiful trees. Plants ran wild everywhere. It was a world of living green. Now, it was simply on account of the marshy land that this vegetation made coal, while our own does not.

I told you that a time was specially planned for coal-making. As the plants and leaves decay, they fell into the water. The gases could still escape, but the carbon, being covered from the action of the air, was left. This is the simple explanation. Silently, and with no human eye to see, the work went on year after year, century after century.

A few of the plants in those days of gigantic forests were like what we have—beautiful feorns as large as many trees. Such now grow only in the tropics. "Horse tails," as you call them, which are now seldom over two feet high, grew then as high as twenty feet. Conifers, like our firs and pines and cedars, were very abundant. But the two most important trees in coalmaking have entirely disappeared from our forests. One of these had no branches, but was covered with leaves and crowned with a cluster at the top. Sometimes they were sixty feet high.

But you don't see how we know that trees did make coal? There are several reasons. If you should put a piece of coal under a microscope, and examine it carefully, you would see the vegetable fibres in it. It is the best proof we could have. Then, besides, in many places stems and leaves are found in the coal, and sometimes trunks of trees are standing in the beds. Again, wood contains silica or sand, and this is found also in coal. You don't understand it as well as I hope you will when you are older; but you can believe it now, and some day prove it for yourselves.

I want you to look at this bright, beautiful diamond. Put that black, smutty piece of coal by the side of it. Wouldn't you think they had about as little in common as any two things in the world? Yet they are made of the same substance—carbon. And although diamonds are the most valuable of gems, and eagerly sought after, the world could get along without them much better than without their black and often despised relation.—Selected.

Home and Health Hints.

A Singular Remedy.—Whenever Burke found himself indisposed, he ordered a kettle of water to be kept boiling, of which he drank large quantities, sometimes as much as four or five quarts in a morning, without any mixture or infusion, and as hot as he could bear. His manner was to pour about a pint at a time into a basin, and to drink it with a spoon as if it had been soup. Warm water, he said, would relax and nauseate, but hot water was the finest stimulant and most powerful restorative in the world. He certainly thought it a sovereign cure for every complaint, and not only took it himself but prescribed it with confidence to every patient that came in his way.—Dublin University.

Squeaking Boots and Shoes.—To prevent the soles of boots and shoes from squeaking, says the boot and shoe Chronicle, rasp the outsole and insole, and every other piece of leather that comes in contact in friction by the action of the foot. Then apply freely good wheat or rye paste. If this is well attended to from heel to toe, the boot or shoe will not squeak.

If you have a crack in the wall in the corner of the room, or anywhere else, do not send for a plasterer, but get five or ten cents' worth of dry plaster of Paris; wet with cold water; then take your finger and rub it into the crevice till it is smooth. Bad nail holes in the wall can be done in the same way. Should the top of your lamp be loose, take it off and wash it with soap; wash the glass also, then put the plaster around the glass; put the brass top on again, let it stand until hardened, and it is ready for use again. A lamp should never be quite full, as the kerosine softens the plaster.

Receipt for Glue for Ready Use.—To the desired quantity of glue use common whiskey instead of water. Put both together in a bottle, cork tight, and set it away for three or four days It will then be fit for use without the application of heat. It will be found a useful and handy article in every household.

To mend chinaware, take a very thick solution of gum-arabic, and stir into it plaster of Paris until the mixture is of a proper consistency. Apply it with a brush to the fractured edges of the chinaware and stick them together. In a few days it will be impossible to break the article in the same place. The whiteness of the cement renders it doubly valuable.

Rancid butter can be made as sweet as when first churned by the following process: To one quart of water add fifty-five drops of the chloride of lime, then wash thoroughly in this mixture; five pounds of rancid butter It must remain in the mixture two hours. Then wash twice in pure water and once in sweet milk; add salt. This preparation of lime contains nothing injurious.

Cheapest Food for Wintering Cows.

In estimating the value of concentrated food for domestic animals regard should be had to the more bulky or coarse fodder that is to be used with it. This necessity arises from the fact that animals utilize the different elements in their food very nearly in certain relations, when they are fed under the same circumstances. If the circumstances of the animals vary, the elements of its food should also vary to accord with them. One class of elements is employed to build up and supply the waste of flesh, and another is used to supply warmth. The former consist of albumen, fibrin, gluten, &c., and are designated by the general name of albuminoids, the latter consist of starch, gum, sugar, &c., and fat, and are classed under one head as supporters of respiration. It is evident that if animals are exposed to the cold it will require a greater proportion of heat-producing food to keep them warm than if they are in a warm atmosphere; and if they are young and growing, it will require a greater proportion of flesh-producing food to supply both waste and growth than it will in adult animals which have only waste to be supplied. In adult animals in comfortable surroundings, it requires for each pound of albuminoids used, five to six pounds of the supporters of respiration, of which fat must always form a part. The following figures show an approximate average of the pounds of albuminoids or flesh-forming and respiratory or heat and fat-forming, food in a ton of each kind of feed in common use. The first column showing the number of pounds of flesh-forming food in a ton, the second of heat and fat-forming food:

Oil Cake	560	1,300
Shorts and refuse of flouring-mill	280	1,200
Corn and oats, equally divided	220	1,600
Corn meal	200	1,700
Red clover hay, cut in blossom	168	760
Red clover hay, ripe	188	540
Common hay	165	820
Fodder corn, cut in blossom	132	1,362
Corn-stalk, ripe	60	827
Straw of cereals, ripe	50	640

It will be seen by a glance at the table that oil-cakes and shorts are much the cheapest, as they give the largest amount of food for a given sum of money; but whether it will be best to purchase these exclusively will depend on what he has to feed with them, and whether his cows are comfortably housed or unhoused. If unhoused, they will be the better for making corn a part of their food more especially so if clover is used for coarse fodder.

Experiments have proved that cows having a live weight of 800 pounds must have daily at least two pounds of albuminoids. A half pound more would be better, but two pounds for 800 of live weight, and a proportionate amount for larger or smaller animals, must be had or the animals will depreciate. No matter how much fat, starch, or sugar is supplied, none of them can take the place of albuminoids in supplying the waste of flesh. Albuminoids are not only necessary to build up flesh and tissue, but even fat cannot be laid in if they are deficient, for the cells for holding the fat will not be formed. With the supporters of respiration it is different. If there is a lack of them their place can be supplied by the flesh-forming elements. The large amount of flesh-forming elements in oilcake is easily digested and readily used to keep up heat and lay on fat. This ability of the albuminoids to serve the double purpose of building up flesh and of supplying heat and fat gives them a value that does not belong to the other class of elements, and hence they generally bear the highest price in market. It is a pretty safe rule to measure the value of food by the amount of flesh-forming material it contains.

It will be interesting to notice how cattle foods diminish in price as they decrease in the percentage of flesh-forming material, and this should be so, for it costs more to produce this kind of material than it does to produce starch, sugar, etc., and hence it is economy for the farmer to work into the food of his stock all of the cheaper class he can. Having provided the two pounds of nitrogenous material necessary to supply the daily waste of flesh in every 800 of live weight, the rest may be made out of starch and sugar in the coarse fodder at a trifling expense. It will be seen by looking over the table how this can be done, remembering to vary the heat producing food according to the cold to be endured. If stock is kept in comfortable quarters, six pounds of starch, etc., for each pound of albuminoids, will suffice; but if most of the time in the open air it will require nine or ten to one. As no single food is equal to a variety, it will pay to mix oil-cake, shorts, and corn, varying the quantities of each to suit the coarse food and exposure.—N. Y. Tribune.

Temperance.

—The report of the Maine authorities, just published, shows that prohibition isn't a failure in that State, if a steady reduction in crime is success.—Boston News.

—A "Connecticut Temperance Publishing Company" has been organized at New Haven by friends of temperance, with a capital of $50,000, on a stock basis.

—The Praying Women's Temperance Union, of Worcester, furnishes the firemen with hot coffee at every fire, the aim being to forestall the demand for intoxicating beverages.

—A professional man not far from State street, Boston, returning to his office one day, after a substantial lunch, said complacently to his assistant, "Mr. Peetkin, the world looks different to a man when he has three inches of rum in him." "Yes," replied the junior, without a moment's hesitation, "and he looks different to the world!"

—The Advance, of this city, lately printed a contribution on the temperance question by Gerritt Smith, evidently one of the last works of his hands. It enforces temperately the policy of legislation which Mr. Smith so long advocated, viz., that the State shall suppress dramshops—places where intoxicating liquors are sold by the drink—as public nuisances.

—Mrs. J. C. Vampel, of McGregor, Ia., has sued several rumsellers, asking damages of $40,000 for selling her husband liquor, which led to his ruin. Mr. Vampel was treasurer of Clayton county for years, and was a man of excellent business ability, but he was incapacitated for work by his habits, and a year ago he mysteriously disappeared and has not since been heard of. Mrs. R. C. Place has begun a suit for $32,000 under almost the same circumstances.

What We Can't Stop We Must Regulate.

"People will drink. We can't stop it. We can't make people pious by law. We can't stop rum-selling. What we can't stop we must regulate."

This is the stereotyped license argument. Let us apply the same argument to gaming and prostitution. We can't stop them. Why then, should we not regulate? Why not license the gaming house and brothel?

A respectable daily answers:

"Because prostitution is a sin, and liquor-selling is not."

Well, suppose liquor-selling is not a "sin." Sin is no sufficient reason for a State law. The State legislates against injuries. It legislates against crows, or wolves, or bugs, or whatever else it finds hurtful. It seizes the cholera or smallpox patient, no matter how innocent. It does not stop to ask whether the slaughter house or powder magazine is sinful or not. If dangerous or harmful that is enough, sin or no sin.

Every license argument applies as strongly to the gaming house and brothel as it does to the dram-shop. The sanitary and police advantages are even stronger. The customers of a licensed gaming house are safer from robbery, and more likely to find a "square game." But that license increases gaming and prostitution is the universal verdict of experience and of common sense. It is a curious fact that legislators who have licensed either of these abominations have always professed to do it in the interest of temperance, purity and public, morals.

In general, these three pests go together. Neither the gaming house nor the brothel can be maintained without the dram-shop. The dram-shop begets and sustains them. The legislator who votes to license the dram-shop votes to sustain its offspring, whether licensed or unlicensed —Boston News.

As long as you make drinking respectable, drinking customs will prevail, and the plowshare of death, drawn by terrible disasters, will go on turning up this whole continent, from end to end, with the long, deep, awful furrow of drunkard's graves.—Talmage.

News of the Week.

The City.

The Chicago Tribune, recently learning that swindlers from two or three places in Kansas were taking advantage of the destitution, came out in an editorial declaiming against sending further aid to the sufferers. This has brought to the editor scores of letters from West bearing undoubted evidence of suffering and privation which must continue yet for months until a new crop is grown. The Tribune publishes the letters but does not take back its words. Mr. Ludlow, a carrier in the Post-office, has given up his business and devoted his time to collecting and forwarding over $2,000 worth of supplies.

—Beside the failure of the Cook County National Bank noticed last week several other firms have lately suspended, among them Page Bro's & Co., heavy leather dealers; Ames, Sherman & Co., wholesale hatters, liabilities $133,410, assets $39.252. Two of the partners were part owners of the Sherman House which had lost money for them. C. A. TenBroeck, carriage manufacturer, has failed for $276,000.

—The recent cold weather has shown its severity in the cases for hospital treatment. One is known to have perished and two or three hundred have been treated for frozen limbs and extremities.

—The monstrosity known as the People's Party in this city is likely to come to an inglorious and speedy end from internal dissension. It was a combination of foreign Know-nothings, a union of Germans and Irish over a beer keg, against native born citizens and laws of long standing and approved merit. The immediate cause of the rupture is the action of their sheriff, an Irishman, in discharging the keeper of the county jail, a German.

—A Scandinavan Society held a festival in honor of Tom. Paine, author of The Age of Reason, last Saturday. Gen. Stiles, former city attorney, was an enthusiastic speaker.

Congressional.

The Democrats greatly rejoice over Andrew Johnson's election to the Senate and there are great expectations indulged in as to the aid and assistance which he will render the party in the next Congress as a bitter antagonist of the Administration. This is the first instance of an ex-President being elected to the United States Senate, and it is also noteworthy that Mr. Johnson is the only ex-President now surviving. His past career however does not warrant very great expectations.

Hamlin (Rep.) from Maine, and Burnside from Rhode Island are to be in the next Senate. The fate of Mat. Carpenter in Wisconsin is still in doubt but it is hardly possible that he will be returned to the Senate.——Conkling of New York has made the greatest speech of the session in the Senate in reply to the opposition arguments on the Louisiana case.——Matters came to a dead lock in the House last week over the Civil Rights bill through the opposition of the Democrats who determined that they would fight off any business for the whole term rather than let it pass. Through this obstinacy a session of fifty continuous hours was held, finally broken by a motion to adjourn from the Republican side at 10 o'clock Friday morning. It is believed that this will so affect business as to thoroughly defeat the Democrats and secure the Bill.

General.

The East River between New York and Brooklyn was frozen over during the recent cold weather and was crossed daily by thousands of people. About noon each day the tugs and steamers would break a passage for the ferries risking the lives of pedestrians, but none are known to have been lost. One ferry boat was frozen up in midsterm and was not released for several hours.

—A bill been introduced into the St. Louis City Council which provides, in section 2, that anyone (of either sex) found guilty of frequenting a house of ill-fame shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to a fine of not less than $50 nor more than $500.

—The Tilton-Beecher trials drags along and will it is prophesied continued till April. Sporting circles are beginning to bet on the result. Moulton is the principal witness examined up to the first of this week. He occupied the witness chair for eleven days, six of which were for a most trying cross-examination by the best lawyers in New York who had prepared before hand some 4,000 questions. His testimony, covering years of correspondence, meetings, settlements, etc., had hardly a flaw. It is no wonder that a person of such acuteness and nerve should be trusted by both the parties. Tilton was called up as witness on Thursday last, but objection was made and a day or more spent in arguing the point by the counsel.

—Philipp Deidesheimer, the mining expert, holds the opinion that the great silver lode recently discovered in Nevada is worth $1,500,000 000. A second visit to the mines has shown him that its resources are greater than he supposed. Consolidated Virginia shares have risen from $38 to $5,000. Deidesheimer has made millions, both for himself and friends.

—The House of Representatives of the Illinois Legislature was last week the scene of a disgraceful parliamentary row, resulting from the incompetency and domagoguery of the Democratic speaker.

—The Congressional Committee in Louisiana find evidence enough of intimidation. The testimony of army officers is very conflicting about affairs in northern Louisiana, but enough that is reliable is given to make the White Leagues fearful of the result.

Foreign.

—The Russian government has recognized Alphonso.

—The London Post announces that the Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath has been offered to Mr. Carlyle, and that Mr. Alfred Tennyson is to be made a baronet.

—The snow drifts in some parts of Scotland about the beginning of the year were twenty feet in depth. The thaw has caused the rivers to overflow their banks in all directions, and vast tracts of land are under water.

—In excavations made for the Lyons Railroad near Fourvieres, France, they have come upon important Roman ruins. An entire Gallo-Roman city was swallowed up in that neighborhood by an earthquake in the year 800. It is thought these ruins may be some part of that city.

—Madrid despatches state that the Government army in Navarre is advancing on the Carlists, and has already captured several of their positions. King Alfonso is present. The news from Carlist sources, dated Hendaye, is that Don Carlos will personally command the troops in the battle which is impending to frustrate the efforts of the Alfonsists to relieve Pamplona.

—Gen. Garibaldi has arrived at Rome, as member of the Chamber of Deputies and has met with an enthusiastic reception. The working men drew his carriage through the streets, which were thronged by crowds who cheered him repeatedly.

—The Belgian Government has submitted a bill in the Lower Chamber prohibited the importation of potatoes from the United States and other countries, as a measure of precaution against the introduction of the Colorado beetle and spread of the potato disease.

MASONRY A WORK OF DARKNESS.

A SERMON BY

protect the perpetrators from the hand of justice, by an accumulated amount of perjury. And as long as Masons adhere strictly to the obligations of their institution, murder and treason, and every other crime which may be perpetrated by Masons, and known only to such as consider the obligations of Masonry sacredly binding, will continue to be concealed, let the amount of perjury, or fines, or imprisonment, be what they may. If forty Masonic offenders should be executed privately; forty widows be left in charge of two hundred and forty fatherless children; and forty thousand Masons were executioners, or accessories to the scenes of death, not a word of testimony could be drawn from one of them, to convict an individual of crime, so long as all concerned adhered strictly to the obligations of Masonry. Subpæna the forty thousand men, put them under oath to declare the whole truth, strict adherence to the Masonic obligations would induce them to remain obstinately silent on the stand, in contumacy and defiance of the power of the civil law, or to testify confederately, that they knew nothing of the affair, and thus perjure themselves, to conceal the crime of murder, though each were fined two hundred and fifty dollars, amounting to ten millions, which would be drawn from the funds of Lodges, Chapters, and Encampments, to defray the expense of Masonic fidelity.

The spirit of Freemasonry exerts every nerve of power to suppress the circulation of its enormities, even after their public disclosure. How carefully was the Morgan abduction, and all the abominations connected with that heaven-daring outrage, kept out of every newspaper in our country which was under Masonic influence! Doubtless, the account would have been suppressed, and the public would have remained ignorant of the facts to this day, had not the independent spirit of FREE PRESSES broken the Masonic enchantment, and set the awful truth before the world. And even after the dead body of Morgan was found, indisputably identified, and laid down to rest in the grave, what but the spirit of darkness, could have invented a stratagem equal to the Masonic imposture which was played off upon the public, by the claims of a Canadian pretender to that body, for the purpose of disproving the death of Morgan, and to conceal the crime which had brought him to the tomb. On any other principle than artifice to conceal Masonic crime, who can account for the facts, that a Mrs. Monroe, from Canada, should journey into the State of New York, in quest of the dead body of her husband, with witnesses to prove the claim, and after finding the body which had been so clearly proved to be the dead body of William Morgan, by incontestable marks, should lay claim to the same body, and prove the claim, by the color and texture of the clothing only; yet, to the full satisfaction of Masons far and near. And on any other principle than device to conceal Masonic crime, which Masons are sworn to do, who cannot account for the bountiful Masonic reward of fifty dollars, which has been publicly declared, without confutation, was given to Mrs. Monroe, by a Mason at the West, with whom had been deposited a large donation from Jerusalem Chapter, in the city of New York, together with sums of money from other Masonic bodies, for the relief of the western sufferers, in consequence of the Morgan abduction? All the apparent mystery which veils any part of this subject, from the most obvious light of truth, is explained in a single sentence: THE WORKS OF DARKNESS ARE ALWAYS EMPLOYED TO CONCEAL THE WORKS OF DARKNESS.

With this self-evident position before us, we may examine all the newspapers in the country, which are edited by the Square, Compasses, and Cable-tow rule, and see how many will be found to contain an insertion of the affidavits of Samuel G. Anderton and Agnes Bell, in relation to the murder of William Miller. Not one, it is presumed; while in many of their columns may be found Masonic burlesque on a well authenticated account of the preparation of a horrid murder, evidently designing to calumniate the character of the deponents, and disprove the truth of their disclosure. After such an example, how often are Masons, or their abettors, heard to speak with a sneer on the subject of the Belfast murder, as though it were a mere ridiculous fabrication! But why is a subject of so much interest, treated with so much contempt? Is the account of atrocious murders, in cases where Masonry is not concerned, thus withheld from the public, or turned to ridicule? If Morgan and Miller had been executed privately, by Elders of Presbyterian Churches, for cheating their Ministers out of the salary which they had promised, and the facts had afterwards been disclosed and sworn to by some of these revolting Elders who witnessed the scene, and confessed that they were under oath to keep the transaction a secret forever, but conscience goaded them to a public disclosure, the circumstances of which were corroborated beyond a reasonable doubt; how long a time would it have required to spread every item of the horrid transaction before the American public and the world, till not a man, woman, nor child, that could read or understand, would be found ignorant of the facts? None would have been uninterested. The story would have been published in every paper; told in every house; and condemned as a deed of darkness by the whole community. But thousands of the American people are, doubtless, to this very day, ignorant of the most horrid Masonic murders, because they are under Masonic influence, by which the publicity of such works of darkness is suppressed. Thousands are so consumately ignorant, to this very day, as to believe that William Morgan is yet alive, speculating on his book of Masonic illustrations; and that Mr. Anderton's account of the murder of William Miller is a mere Anti-Masonic story, to create public prejudice against Masonry. Such ignorance is the result of Masonic device, to conceal the atrocity of the institution. One important fact, however, is incontestably proved by the Masonic power of concealment, which is, that all unsuccessful attempts to elicit testimony to prove the wicked acts which the oaths of Masonry bind its votaries to keep secret, adds substantially to the list of testimony to prove that the whole Masonic fabric, from the foundation to the top-stone, belongs to the Works of Darkness. When God shall bring all these hidden things to light, then will be known to the world of intelligent beings, the secret murders, the perjury, and all the horrid deeds of darkness which the oaths of Masonry have kept concealed.

Facts and Figures.

—Switzerland turns out about 1,600,000 watches per annum. The industry is chiefly confined to the cantons of Neufchatel, Berne, Vaud and Geneva, and gives employment to 15,241 men and 12, 727 women.

It is stated on British authority, that there were 4.335 steamships afloat in 1872, of which 2,538 were from Great Britain and averaged 850 tons each. The year following, 460 steamers were built in Great Britain, avereging 1,167 tons each. It is estimated that there are 5,250 steamers afloat this year. The figures do not include river craft.

—The English Postoffice Department last year received $26,740,000, and expended $18,965,000. 42,000 persons, including both sexes, are employed. There are 12,500 postoffices in the United Kingdom. About 907,000,000 letters, 72,000,000 postal cards, 129,000,000 packets of books, and 125,000,000 newspapers passed through the department. The revenue derived from the telegraph department was $235,000. The postoffice saving banks are regarded as very successful. At the end of 1873 there were $105,000,000 deposited in them.

—The main feature of a new plan, on trial in the British navy, for raising sunken ships, is closing hermetically the hatches and all openings in the upper parts, and pumping down air. The air thus introduced rises toward the under side of the deck, and, not being able to escape, presses the water down and out through holes made in the ship's bottom. The vessel will by this means be rendered buoyant and rise to the surface.

—A curious Frenchman has lately been making a calculation, which is that a man talks on an average three hours a day at the rate of about twenty-nine octavo pages an hour. This would make eighty-seven pages a day, about six hundred a week, which would amount to fifty-two good-sized volumes every year! And then, multiply this by the number of years in a man's life, what a library he should have if it should all be printed! And, too, how very little of the whole would be worth preserving, and of how much he would be so glad if it had been left unsaid.

—A medical writer of eminence has been collecting evidence as to the chances of life which children have, upon being born, in different countries. Out of 10,000 children born, it has been found from official statistics that in Norway as many as 7,415, or roughly speaking, three out of every four, live to be twenty-four years of age. In England, 6,527 so live, or 778 fewer than in Norway. In the United States boys have nearly as good a chance for life as in England, while girls have not. But in France only 5,022, or scarcely more than one out of two, reach twenty. While in Ireland no more than 4,855, or actually less than one out of two, attain that age. More surprising still are the statistics regarding old age. Out of the 10,000, for example, we learn that in Norway 3,487, more than one out of three, reach seventy; in England, almost one out of four; in the United States, still men only, one out of four—a trifle higher than England; In France, 1,776, or about one of 8 1-2, and in Ireland, only 861, or one out of 11 1-2. If this table is to be depended upon, we thus learn of all countries in the world Norway offers the new-born child the best chance of a long life, while Ireland offers the worst.

—If the coal beds of the earth should ever become exhausted it is possible that these sources of supply may be replaced by new beds rising from the bottom of the seas. Indeed something of the kind is now actually occurring. The island of Newfoundland, which contains 27,000 square miles, and has a population of 100,000, is joined by banks or shoals much larger than the island itself. It is on these banks that the cod fisheries are so extensively pursued. The Grand Bank is 600 miles long by 200 miles broad. Now it has been conclusively shown that the whole island is rising from the sea, and in the course of time may be expected to join its banks, which are also rising. Great seams of coal, which are pronounced inexhaustable, have been discovered in Newfoundland, and there is no reason to doubt that these seams also extend under the banks. So it appears that in one case at least coal beds are now coming to the surface from the depths of the ocean, and it is not improbable that similar forces may be producing similar results in other parts of the world.

—A correspondent of the Evangelist writes of the commercial growth of California: "Of the commercial future of this Golden Gate no man doubts. Steamers pass its walls for Yokohama and China, for the Sandwhich Islands and Australia, for Mexico and the Isthmus and South America, and for Oregon, Washington and Alaska. Twenty-seven ships laden with wheat were ready to sail when we left, and this was only a beginning in the export of this great cereal. It is said that seven hundred ships of a thousand tons each would be needed to carry away the wheat surplus of the present year, the whole crop being not less than from thirty to forty millions of bushels. One-third of the wheat export of the United States, and one-eighth of the exports in wool last year, were from the Pacific coast. Great as is the commerce of the sea, the overland trade constantly increases. During the first six months of the present year the value of exports over the Pacific Railroad was $65,572,223, which exceeded by $6,915,725 the values for the same period during the two preceding years taken together. As an indication of the increased population, it may be said that the Central Pacific Railroad Company has sold in the year past about four and a half millions of acres of land, receiving an aggregate value of over twenty-six millions of dollars. Thirty-four thousand were added to the citizenship of the State last year, and at the present rate of increase this year will be sixty thousand."

The pleasure of doing good is the only one that does not wear out.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issued by him, purporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationalist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—'The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The author belonged to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughout the country forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is supposed by many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acquainted with Mr. Greene, and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y., and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—'The Storm Gathering;' "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

History of The Abduction and Murder of Cap't. Wm. Morgan,

Will the Cynosure Subscription List be Doubled This Year?

Before we attempt to answer this question, we sincerely ask those few friends who are tired of this subject not to read this column. We confess we have had considerable to say upon it and we believe the majority of readers who desire to see the cause of Christ prevail, have been interested in what has been said.

On the first of January our mail list numbered 4,000 subscriptions (a few more) nearly all of these expire at some time during the year, and in order to have the list doubled by January 1st, 1876, it will necessary to receive about 8,000 renewals and new subscriptions during the present year. This will be an easy thing if every one does his duty. The conflict is waxing warmer. Masonry demands recognition and slanders those who will not bow to her. She would put them into a fiery furnance. Be sure that Christ will walk with his children. Spread the light. Be instant in season, out of season and we can answer the question with which we commenced.

Does your subscription expire in February? If so, please send renewal (with new subscription if convenient) promptly. Write at least and tell us what you want to have done about your paper.

Will all who have not returned the petitions please do so as soon as possible.

The Health Reformer is an entertaining and instructive family magazine, devoted to practical hygiene, and all subjects relating to health. It gives instruction to the well which will enable them to retain health, and points out to the invalid the true way to regain lost health. The number of January contains interesting articles on the following subjects: Bible Hygiene, The Medical Use of Alcohol, Dangers of Pork-Eating Exposed, London, The Confession of a Reformed Smoker, The Hygienic Platform, Universal Suffocation, Who Are Extremists? American Health Association, and many other important subjects relating to diet and general hygiene. Published at Battle Creek, Mich. Terms, ONE DOLLAR A YEAR.

The following letter explains itself:

It is printed in black and two tints, on heavy plate paper, 24x27 in., and is by far the most finished print of this magnificent building yet produced. It has the sanction of the Centennial Board of Finance who have ordered a large number for distribution among the representatives of foreign nations. Price 50 cts, sent by mail, postage paid. Agents wanted in every town. Any worthy young man or woman can secure a handsome income by canvassing for this popular picture." Address,

A Masonic Swindle.

Some of our readers will remember that before we republished the old Morgan book, we kept for sale a book entitled, "Morgan's Freemasonry Exposed" and explaned: showing the origin, history and nature of Freemasonry, its effects on the government and the Christian religion, and containing a key to all the degrees of Freemasonry . . with the verdict of the jury in relation to the murder of the author; the whole intended as a guide to the craft and a light to the unenlightened, by Captain William Morgan."

In advertising the book, we declared it to be an evident Masonic swindle, yet a nearly correct revelation of a few degrees of Freemasonry. The book is published by Dick & Fitzgerald, of New York, and evidently in the interests of the craft, who make use of it to fool Anti-masons. Two or three years ago Rev. I. A. Hart, gave a review of this book in the Cynosure and showed nearly a score of lies on the title page alone.

1st. It gives no history of the origin of Freemasonry. 2d. It gives no history of the institution. 3d. William Morgan is not the author of the book, and only a portion of it is copied from his book with intentional errors. 4th. It does not even attempt to show the influence of Freemasonry on the Christian religion, or our government. 5th. It does not give a key to all the degrees, but only to the first seven. 6th. There is barely a note in reference to the trial of the abductors of Morgan. 7th. Under the title: Explanation, p. 120, the author is made to virtually call himself a "Perjured Wretch," and before he gets through he says: "I need no longer conceal the fact that I MYSELF was the person, not a Mason." We call attention to this swindle again, because Freemasons are circulating this book, declaring it to be the "old Morgan book."

Postage on the Cynosure.

THE POSTAGE ON THE CYNOSURE MUST BE PAID AT CHICAGO. It is twenty cents a year.

The cost of postage now depends entirely on the size and weight, and therefore some smaller papers charge but fifteen cents; and others about the size of the Cynosure charge twenty-five cents a year for postage.

If the subscription price of the CYNOSURE was $2.50 or $3.00 a year, the price of many religious papers containing no more reading matter, we might afford to pay the postage ourselves, but at $2.00 a year we cannot do this with our present Subscription list.

Therefore let all send the postage, 20 cents a year, 10 cents for half a year with their renewals.

The commission on one new subscription for a year will pay the postage on your own and the new subscriber's paper. We would rather have the postage paid by commissions than in any other way.

When postage is not paid we shall have to shorten the time of subscription sufficiently to pay it.

Topics of the Time.

While the Romish bishops are declaiming against the public schools in Ohio, Romish laymen, well trained and obedient, are working for the same end, through the temporary supremacy of a Bourbon Democracy in the legislatures of Illinois and Missouri. In the former, a Mr. Honan wants the Constitution amended to "provide for an equitable distribution of all money appropriated for school purposes among the free schools of the State, provided each religious sect may establish free schools and be entitled to an equitable share." In Missouri the Jesuits have brought in an act to apportion the money raised for public schools among all the children in the State, and to permit parents and guardians who send their children or wards to private schools to receive from the State the portion due them under such an appointment. If Americans are ready to sell their birthright for the pottage of greed and indulgence they are ready for a despot.

While the financial panic of 1873 has had a salutary effect on the extravagance of the country at large, many people imagine that the national government rises above the stormy strata of money matters, with inexhaustable treasures in its bosom. And so we find an army of railroad builders, canal diggers, river and harbor improvers, besieging the doors of Congress for an aggregate indemnity of eight or nine hundred millions of dollars. "Tom Scott" of Pensylvania leads the van with the flag of the Texas Pacific Road, and has succeeded in making an impression, if nothing more. A very strong barricade, however, exists, in a resolution passed during the early part of the present session, saying that in the present state of the treasury no subsidies of any kind should be given to any public or private enterprise managed by an association. This will, no doubt, be a sufficient fortification to the virtue of the average Congressman.

American voters will do well to mark the behavior of legislative bodies this winter and take down several items for future reference. Upon the result of the last election were based many hopes of good behavior from both parties. See their manners. The Illinois Legislature is Democratic and both branches are presided over by members of that party. Lately the Speaker of the lower House ruled that body into a condition little better than a brawling mob. The other day part of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives set themselves forcibly against the Speaker and Sergea t-at-arms and the body broke up with pistols brandishing. Last week in reply to Butler's severe language on Southern character, John Young Brown, of Kentucky, an unreconstructed rebel, lied to the Speaker to get in a scathing personal allusion to the Massachusetts member. Immediately the House was in an uproar at the bold insult; but the body recovered its dignity and brought the bully to the bar for a severe reprimand. The party now foremost must show better manners to win the confidence of the people.

The ninth of February is a day devoted to a pitiable display in New Orleans. For years before the war this day was celebrated as a carnival devoted to the Monarch of Misrule; the idea resembling the famed Saturnalia of ancient Rome. The dull season of Lent, which begins on the day following, Ash-Wednesday, forms a dark background upon which the carnival was painted by anticipation in bright and fantastic colors. Rich and poor, white man and negro, all looked forward to Mardi-gras as the great day of the year. Birthdays and weddings, Christmas, New Years and the Fourth of July all paled before its splendor. Masquerades, processions of grotesque characters, feasting and dancing filled the time. For four years during the war all pleasure was absorbed in the bitterness of strife, but that gone the day has revived with greater extravagance than ever. One of the features of a late carnival was taken from the Darwinian theory of development and the king of the rout was represented with subjects from every order of created life with grotesque and hideous shapes. Not only is all New Orleans abandoned to this strife after the ridiculous, but distant cities join the folly and the railroads make special rates to increase the crowd of idle gazers. This year we see the marvel of a great city for a time given over to excess while a thousand murderers walk its streets with no public dishonor. Its people are distracted by factions; its business men stared in the face by ruin; the public credit gone; the laws ignored; and ten thousand citizens of the State in constant jeopardy of their lives. Amid such scenes these children of superstition and formalism turn lightly from grave duties to the gayety and folly of a Saturnalia. A community so slightly holding the laws should not complain of rigorous rulers.

Rev. D. T. Stoddard's Letter to the Amherst Students.

NORTHAMPTON, Aug. 14, 1849.

DEAR SIR:—Unfortunately for the object you have in view, I was a member of the Alpha Delta Phi while in Yale College, and cannot therefore answer your question with great definiteness. I will, however, say that I should never join a secret institution of this kind, were I to go through college again. I will say farther, that I have known some secret societies to be productive of great mischief among students, the secrecy being made use of for evil purposes, and tending to make the members of them dissipated and corrupt in their morals. For the reason stated above, I will not give my opinion whether secret societies in college may not be so managed as to do no harm, but as a general thing this is far from being the fact.

Having been connected with four different colleges, either as an officer or a student, I have had some opportunity to observe the operation of this principle of secrecy, and therefore speak of what I know.

Respectfully yours,
D. T. STODDARD.

The Evil Tendency of Political Secret Societies.

BY SYD. SHAFFER, ESQ.

Go with me back in history several thousand years, and we find a secret political society among the Athenians, called the mystery of Ceres or Initia. There were several degrees in this society. As a matter of course the ceremony was performed at night, so as to inspire greater terror. Visions glared before the astonished candidate, and extraordinary and dreadful voices and sounds were heard. A sudden glaring, overwhelming and dazzling glow of light and splendor dispelled the darkness, and then in a flash disappearing, enveloped the trembling candidate in total darkness, and added new horrors to the frightful proceedings. Rollin, the celebrated historian, says: "Apparitions, claps of thunder, earthquakes, heightened the terror and amazement, while the person admitted, stupified, and sweating through fear, heard trembling the mysterious volumes read to him, if in such a condition he was capable of hearing at all. These nocturnal rites were attended with many disorders which the severe law of silence imposed on the person initiated, prevented from coming to light." What was the result or evils that flowed from this secret political society? The peace of the nation was disturbed, and oppression and death followed in its wake. Socrates would not be initiated into these mysteries, and his religion was suspected, and the midnight conclave conspired against him, and imprisoned and put to death the noblest philosopher of the age. None but members were admitted into the temple or lodge-room of Ceres. We are informed by Livy, a distinguished historian, that two Arcarnanians having gone into the lodge-room by mistake, and with no ill design, following the crowd of members, were both put to death without mercy. For any one to divulge these secrets and mysteries was to be a wretch accursed, excommunicated and punished with death. Diagoras, the Melian, was prescribed by this society, and a reward set upon his head; and Alcibiades disgraced, and afterwards his residence burnt to ashes, and when he had rushed through the flames, he was shot to death with arrows. And many were the wrongs, public and private, perpetrated by this secret political society.

The next political society to which I shall call your attention was the notorious Inquisition. What was the result? Christians were hunted down like wild beasts; burnt at the stake; sawed asunder; hewed to pieces; torn and mutilated upon the wrack, and put to death in the most horrid, brutal, cruel and disgraceful manner. As St. Paul says of ancient Scripture worthies, they also had "trial of cruel mockings and scourgings, of bonds and imprisonment; were stoned; were sawn asunder; were slain with the sword; were destitute, afflicted, tormented." And others to escape the malignity of this secret political society, "wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens, and in caves of the earth."

Secret political societies reigned throughout France, and what was the result? Streams of blood ran down the streets of Paris, and the river Seine was crimsoned with human gore, and on its bosom vast numbers of dead bodies floated toward the ocean, and the Republic of France went down in blood!

Through the influence of secret political societies France became a nation of infidels, suicides, murderers and robbers. Levington tells of a secret political society that planned the French Revolution, and that "fifty thousand Knights armed and trained burst forth upon France like a river of burning lava!"

We will now come to our own country. The first secret political society which we shall notice was that organized under Aaron Burr, who objected was the dismemberment of this great Republic. This conspiracy was carried on by the aid of secret cypher writing. This society failed, bringing disgrace and ruin on its leader, and a most melancholly fate to some of those he beguiled into his snares. Thus ended the wicked ambition of Aaron Burr.

The next we shall notice was the secret political society of "Know Nothings." They even created such a fearful state of affairs that imaginary coffins filled with knives, guns and pistols were buried for deposit and bloody work in grave yards; hostile bands were preparing for murder and plunder; days were set for one universal massacre of Protestants; men were on parol; towns guarded; the most bitter, hostile feelings were bred and encouraged, and civil war was threatened. Mobs, riot, bloodshed and death followed. All gotten up that a few ambitious men might ride into office.

The next political society to which we will call your attention was the famous Ku-Klux society. This society commenced by opposing those loyal to this government, then followed murder, and increasing in vast numbers they dissolved the union, and more than a million of lives were lost.

And now we hear of another secret political society, "the White League!" Masked ruffians shoot quiet, inoffensive men down by the road side; hang them to trees; tear out their tongues; riddle them with buck shot before the eyes of their distracted familes; fire into and break up peacible political, religious or other meetings. Assassins from ambush cut to pieces their victims. At other times peaceful citizens are murdered in droves. Why are these murders committed? It is because their victims did not adopt the same political principles that were held and advocated by the infamous White League.

It makes no difference in what interest or what name a secret political society may be run. It becomes a dangerous institution. Whether in the name of religion, as the old Inquisition, or in the name of temperance, or by hanging out the popular flag of freedom—the devil is the Arch Ku-Klux!

Look at the meanness of secret political temperance societies! Draw aside the curtain, and take a look into the secret conclave. In these dens are discussed the political character of individuals; a vote is taken whether they will support certain candidates or not. The secret serpent of malice, revenge and slander here in ambush plants his venomous sting. The victim has no means of defense; no opportunity to silence the lie; no chance to crush the slander beneath his feet! Often in these hidden holes in the wall, at the hour of midnight, they are making most "hellish meals of good men's names." Often, too, a candidate for election is selected in these secret lodges and then the members enter organized and en mass into convention, and thereby carry and control, and make their outside dupes nothing more than puppets or wooden men, they having laid and pulled all the wires! The outsider is then led like the thoughtless lamb to slaughter! The outsider is used as a cat's paw for the monkey to pull chestnuts out of the fire.

As we have seen, secret political societies when endowed with power are inclined to injury, oppression, robbery and even murder! When they have not the power, then their influence is exerted to destroy a man financially and politically and ruin his reputation. And the higher a man stands in morality, intelligence and worth in a community, the greater will be the exertion to destroy his influence and blacken his character.

Let us suppose a case. The mechanics organize into a political secret society. No one, however worthy and competent, shall be elected to office unless he belongs to this society. This society aspires to control all the offices, all the power of the government, for their advantage and benefit. A bitter feeling is engendered against the professional man and the farmer. The professional man is soon looked upon as a pirate, and the farmer as a swindler, and everything is done to break down their influence, character, respectibility, prosperity and financial resources. Here is a sworn clan in our midst that conspires against the rights of the people and endeavors in their midnight conclaves to centralize all the power in their hands, and run the machinery of the government according to its own dictates. Here is a dark lantern, selfish clan that has instituted a rebellion, and conspires against the liberties of our nation. What sets the farmer, the merchant, the lawyer, the preacher, the grocer, the hotel-keeper, and the cattle-buyer to this high-handed outrage upon their political, financial and reputational interest?

Now let us suppose another case. A few ambitious politicians desiring office and spoils form a secret political society of farmers. At once they begin to instill into the minds of the members that they are fearfully wronged by all other classes; that they alone should hold all the offices; that the government should be run alone for their interest; that they are not bound to respect the rights, liberties and welfare of other classes; that the whole power of the government should be centralized with them. The members begin to look upon all other classes with suspicion—all others are robbers and usurpers, and unworthy of confidence. Soon the most bitter hatred is bred against mechanics, professional men, and other classes. They grasp for more power and the social intercourse that once existed is becoming embittered, and a rebellion is instituted, a new nation is formed, girded by secrecy and oaths, and the general welfare of society is endangered. Why should this hostile feeling exist against other classes of good citizens—republican brothers! Why against villages, cities, mechanics, grocers, merchants, dealers, manufactures and professional men? Are we not dependent on one another. Do not the mechanics and manufacturers furnish the farmer with plows, harrows, knives and forks, chairs, dishes, clocks, threshing machines, houses, barnes, harness, wagons, carriages—every implement, machine, utensil, tool and mechanical convenience in the house and out that is used by the farmer? Why then should the farmer make war on all other classes? Are they not all brothers in the vineyard of the Lord depending on the labor and toil of the other, mental or physical?

You might as well say the good of a single organ of the body is to be preferred to the whole body, when the life and prosperity of a part depends upon the health and good of the whole body. Are the parts superior to the whole? Is not the whole made up of parts? Do not the parts subsist from the whole? Destroy all the parts except one, and will not the whole tumble to ruin?

Well hath Holy Writ said: "For the body is not one member, but many. If the foot shall say, because I am not the hand, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? And if the ear shall say, because I am not the eye, I am not of the body; is it therefore not of the body? If the whole body were an eye, where were the hearing? If the whole body were hearing, where were smelling? But now God set the members every one of them in the body, as it hath pleased him. And if they were all one member where were the body? But now are they many members, yet but one body. And the eye cannot say unto the hand, I have no need of thee; nor again the head to the feet, I have no need of thee. Nay, much more those members of the body, which seem to be more feeble, are necessary: That there should be no schism in the body; but that the members should have the same care one for another. And whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it; or one member be honored all the members rejoice with it."

So it is with this government, we are a great brotherhood of classes depending upon each other, and when one class suffers the whole will be afflicted. Let there be no schism in the nation; but that all classes should have the same care one for another. Let us beware of the slow, creeping, hidden poison of secret societies. An open enemy with the mask torn off is easier to contend with than the hidden viper or the evils in ambush.

Let a secret political society get the reigns of the government in their hands, I care not whether in the name or interest of religion, temperance or liberty, or any other name, they will plunder the public treasury, invade the rights of the masses, commit pejury, oppress and persecute good citizens, and ruin the nation.

Look again to the age of gunpowder plots, conspiracies and assassinations instigated by secret political societies. Even the church smiled upon, encouraged, implored the intercession of the saints, and glorified the Knights of the Dagger! When Regent Murray, Prince William of Orange, Henry III. and Henry IV. of France fell at the hands of assassins Gerard, Clemant, Chatel and Ravaillac, the sworn wretches sent out on errands of murder, that the Inquisition might be restored, and that the religious freedom of Scotland, the Dutch Republic and France might be trodden in the dust, it was then the Angel Gabriel was addressed—intercession was made with the Virgin Mary, and the remains of some of the assassins were gathered and exposed as relics of holy veneration!

More Respecting the Philadelphia Presbytery of the United Presbyterian Church, and Freemasons and Odd-fellows.

Mr. Editor:—Referring to the report given in the Cynosure of January 28th, of the church-case tried in the above named Presbytery on January 12th, I have now to state, in farther proof of the complicity of that Presbytery with Freemasons and Odd-fellows in their congregations, that the official report of the Presbytery's proceedings on that occasion, has since been published in the Christian Instructor (of January 23d), duly authenticated by the moderator and clerk of the Presbytery; and, incredible to tell! there is not one word in the official report of the proceedings, about the Odd-fellow's case! The report, in fact, is a transcript of "the play of Hamlet, with the character of Hamlet left out"! This, as I have learned on good authority, was done by a compact of the Presbytery, after the case was disposed of. As it is probable that some simple unsophisticated United Presbyterians, who may read the report furnished of the Odd-fellowship case to your paper, and who may also see the Presbyterial official report, may conclude that the report which you have published could not be true, since not a word about any such case is to be found in the official report of the Presbytery's doings, let me re-assure such doubters that every word is true of the report which was furnished to you, and which you have published. A more glaring instance of suppressio veri—of suppression of the truth—I think it will be difficult to find. What confidence can the people place in the official report of their church proceedings, if such practices, in order to conceal the truth, are to go unrebuked? Besides, how foolish, not to say simple, is such an expedient! The Presbytery forgets, it would seem, that there is such an association as the National Association for reforming the nation and the churches in regard to secretism,—and that there is such a thing still left to reformers, as an independent press, viz, the Cynosure; and that "a bird of the air shall carry the voice; and that which hath wings will tell the matter." (Eccles. x. 20). Is it not strange that it did not occur to those managing presbyters, that this very attempt to suppress facts which every member of their church was entitled to know, would most likely be exposed, and that wheir exposed, it would recoil on their own heads and be a convincing proof to every one, even the most skeptical, of them consciousness of being justly obnoxious to the censures of their brethren throughout the U. P. church? And, besides, does not the fact of such a suppression of truth convincingly show how powerful is the influence wielded by Freemasonry, Odd-fellowship, etc., over the U. P. Presbytery of Philadelphia?

W. S. R.

Philadelphia, Jan. 30, 1875.

The Question before the Seventh-day Baptist General Conference.

Among the several resolutions presented for the consideration of the Conference, was one concerning secret societies, (see minutes in Recorder of Oct. 15th). For a number of years there have been resolutions presented on this subject, of about the same import, but thus far they seem to meet with opposition. Why is this so? Simply because there are many, who, notwithstanding the repeated protests of the majority of our leaders, will still insist upon remaining in, and uniting themselves with said societies. Some, no doubt, have good motives in uniting with the "Good Templars," thinking thereby to induce others to become interested, and perchance turn them away from the intoxicating cup; others, we have good reason to believe, become members merely to gratify curiosity, and find, after being initiated, that it makes a very pleasant resort, particularly if young people. Perhaps it would be well to say right here, that we were once connected with this fraternity, and can truly say (although in a partially backslidden state) that it failed to satisfy, in about the same degree, that nursery tales fail in satisfying the mind of mature years; the forms and ceremonies seem very much like children's play, and being unable to see any great good resulting therefrom, we honorably withdrew. If temperance societies are what we need, why not have them open to all? Can there not be just as much good accomplished and no more danger of yielding to the tempter, than if there were certain given signs, passwords, and handshaking, which must not be revealed; if a person cannot keep the pledge in an open society, they surely would be no more likely, in a secret one. As for "Masonry," it is indeed a wonder that any Christian man dare to bind himself by such terribly shocking oaths as we have read in their own books; and when they plead that "Freemasonry" is founded on the Bible, it is as false as any other invention of Satan, and an insult to the Holy One. Who, that is possessed with common sense, and can read the Word of God, can see any truth in such a statement, when there is not the least passage of Scripture to countenance secret "cliques." It is no wonder that our brethren in Christ, those whose hairs are white with the frosts of time, so earnestly plead with you as Christians, to break away from such associations. Now, in view of all these things, would it not be well, on a careful reflection, to consider their feelings. We believe this would be well pleasing in the sight of our heavenly Father. It is grievous to them, because they can see more evil than good, as the result of such connections outside the church. We certainly cannot be too faithful as workers in the church; and if we possess the fruit of the Spirit, we shall not leave temperance out in the cold; nor can we work elsewhere more effectually. If Christ be ours, we need no other "Most Worshipful," nor will we care for a better "Grand Worthy."

Our Bible teaches us that God is not pleased with anything short of the whole heart; and if we would serve him acceptably, our actions must speak as loud as our words. If we would do good, we must be as a "city set on a hill." "Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works, and thus be made to glorify your Father which is in heaven." We are not to go into some dark corner, and hide our "candle under a bushel," nor "choose darkness rather than light," unless our deeds are evil. Let us be careful not to offend a brother, but see that we do follow "after the things which make for peace." Unless we can be united as a people, there will be little hope of becoming strong in the Lord. May we become as little children, teachable, governed by the great principle, love; and if we love God, we shall love the brethren, not with a selfish love, which seeks our own ways, regardless of offense, but with that love which is born of the Spirit, which "yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness." In conclusion, we will say, the words of Paul are as applicable in this case as in the eating of meat, &c., and if all are desirous of becoming humble, it does seem to us the counsels of our fathers in Israel will not go unheeded.—Sabbath Recorder.

"Am I my Brother's Keeper?"

BY ENOCH HONEYWELL.

Yes. Read Ezekel xxxiii. and you will know you are, and that you will be held to that responsibility. Were I to see an innocent boy playing in a canoe at the head of Niagara rapids, unadvised of the converging power of four great lakes pushing him into the fearful cataract below him, while I stand on shore sucking in stupidity from my pipe and saying, "Am I my brother's keeper?" and give no warning till he plunges down the fatal falls, —Would God hold me guiltless? Every sound conscience answers no.

Well, we now see millions of our sons floating down the ripples of time, ignorant of the five thousand hidden pits in their paths, from which those who fall in can only escape at the hazard of being, like Elder Rathburn, beaten, shot, and poisoned after they are out.

Now can any man, who believes his soul is worth caring for, see those young men passing along among such pits and refuse to warn them of their danger, or even to give them a little rush-light tract showing how to avoid the pits, and be guiltless? Again, manhood, honor, pity, conscience, all say No.

When Cain was called to account for his brother's blood, and said "Am I my brother's keeper?" the answer was, "The voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground, and now art thou cursed from the earth."

Public Morals.

There are institutions and customs among us, countenanced, patronized, vindicated by Christian men and women, which are, in this respect, essentially heathenish and utterly revolting. Such an institution is the theater. Who would endure to see his own wife, daughter or sister, pacing the public stage to represent, in word or act, the varying phases of a sinful, or even of a lawful love? Yet the interests of nearly every play turns on the working, or the perversion, of this divine passion whose holy secrets every true woman instinctively veils from common view. But there are still viler features which seem inseparably engrafted on the theater. We need only to glance at the play bills which are posted on our streets, or observe the columns of the daily press, to see that the shameless exposure of the female form is one of the chief attractions of the modern stage. There is not a theater in the land that does not fall under this reproach. The ballet dancer of to-day is simply the modern Herodias; her vocation is no higher than that of the dancing girls in an oriental seraglio, and the taste which demands such amusements avows the heathenish principle that the chief end of woman is to minister to the gratification of man. Even where there is no immediate design of lewdness, where the only motive is the perfection of the dance and the fuller revelation of the charm of rythmical and graceful motion, where the spectator looks on the moving spectacle before him as he would on figures in wax or marble, still the charge holds good that woman, a rational being with an immortal soul, created to share with man the high responsibilities of life, endowed with beauty as a means of blessed influence over human hearts, is set upon the stage to expose her charms for the gratification of the crowd. Fathers whose heads would bow with shame to see their own daughters in that giddy throng, mothers who would withdraw their girls from the very touch of a stage-dancer, as social pollution, yet carry them to witness, in more or less refined or repulsive aspects, these barbarian spectacles. Do they forget that these girls are somebody's daughters? Do they imagine that any class of women can be degraded, without lowering the respect which is felt for all women? The theater of to-day is the enemy of woman. It looks back to heathenism, and, if allowed, would speedily carry us there. The woman who patronizes it, or apologizes for it, assists in the degradation, and retards the elevation of her sex. And, for reasons palpable to all well-informed persons, the same argument is justly urged, with steadily increasing force as years go by, against the dancing customs in vogue in modern society. It is strange that the Christian church, whose work is so largely the elevation of woman, and which is dependent so largely on Christian womanhood for her success, lifts up, in all her branches, a uniform and stringent testimony against both the stage-play and the dance? The American Congress, soon after the declaration of Independence, passed the following resolution:—

"Whereas, true religion and good morals are the only solid foundation of public liberty and happiness:

"Resolved, that it be, and hereby is, earnestly recommended to the several States, to take the most effectual measures for the encouragement thereof, and for the suppression of theatrical entertainments, horse-racing, gaming and such other diversions as are productive of idleness, dissipation and a general depravity of principles and manners."

Is it strange that Christian citizens, observing with alarm the growing laxity of morals, are striving to bring back the government to see the principles of that earlier and better time?—Christian Statesman.

Military Usurpation.

So far is the military from being a dangerous power in a well-governed State that it is the power which guarantees law, order, peace and freedom. It is true, all civil means should be used to keep the peace, but it is the knowledge that the soldier's bayonet is, in case of need, behind the policeman's baton, that gives the latter most of its power.

Martial law has no terrors for peaceable people who have lived under it. On the contrary, they will generally testify that it was a great safeguard against the excited feelings of troublous times. Of course a well-regulated community needs no martial law, no soldiers and no bayonets; but where one-half of the community is determined to keep the other half out of their rites as men and citizens, and to this end to proscribe and murder them at will, that community can scarcely be said to be well regulated.

In any country with free institutions, such as the United States, Britain, or Canada, it is only evil-doers and disturbers of the peace who have any reason to fear the military, and the talk about President Grant's becoming another Julius Cæsar or Napoleon Bonaparte, is all the sheerest bosh that ever was uttered even by excited opponents.

Were a military leader like McClellan or Grant, at the head of a million of men, to attempt to overthrow the Government, he would find himself without a corporal's guard the next day; and were a President to attempt to prolong his reign, contrary to law, he would not find one man, civil or military, to stand by him. If, on the other hand, he would attempt to carry his election by violence or intimidation, as the White Leaguers do, he would just break down his own party, as they are breaking down theirs.

The men who are constantly shrieking about the Republic in danger pay a very poor compliment to its stability. Its greatest danger is not Sheridan, but caste; and the lobby at Washington is incomparably more formidable to free institutions than the army or the President.—N. Y. Witness.

—Generosity is catching; and if so many men escape it, it is in a great degree from the same reason that countrymen escape the small-pox, because they meet with no one to give it to them.

Reform News.

From the Ohio Agent.

NEVADA, O., Feb. 1, 1875.

BRO. K:—It has been some time since I gave any account of my whereabouts, and of my labors in the cause of our reform. Well, I have only to say as the Saviour said of the woman who anointed his feet, I have done what I could. For the last two weeks I have been most interestingly engaged in the vicinity of home, and that too with but little expense for travel, as I furnish my own conveyance. I will speak of two places more particurly, one in Homes Township, Wyandot Co., the other Bucyrus.

At the first I gave two lectures on Masonry, first evening on the religion of Masonry; the second on its politics. At the close of the second a unanimous vote was cast for a lecture on the grange which I gave on last Monday night, the two on Masonry were given on Friday and Saturday nights previous. At the close of the grange lecture another vote was taken and they voted unanimously again for another lecture showing the design and object of Freemasonry, which comes off Thursday evening of this week, my engagements being such that I could not give that lecture any earlier. On the first evening I learned before commencing that a ten degree Mason was there, and said that he would correct me if I made any mistakes. Of course this gave me to understand what I might expect, and I fortified myself accordingly by planting my battery mainly upon good Masonic authority. In the course of my remarks I quoted several obligations taken in the Master's and Royal Arch degrees, which I expected would be contradicted, but the oaths in reference to keeping the secrets, in the one case murder and treason excepted, and the other not excepted, was permitted to pass without any objection being offered. When I quoted the obligation in the Royal Arch degree in regard to aiding and assisting a companion R. A. M. when engaged in any difficulty, and espouse his cause so far as to extricate him from that difficulty, whether he be right or wrong,—this was too much, and he belched out, "That is false;" "That is'nt true," etc. I then paused in my remarks, and said: "I will put the question to you in this form: Sir, I assert that every obligation that I have quoted to-night is true substantially. Will you be qualified that they are not true substantially?" To which he replied, "The last one quoted I am willing to swear is not true." Again I said, "Supposing there should be a little discrepancy between my wording of the oath, and the way it was administered to you, still I inquire if you are willing to swear that the obligation is not in purport just as I stated?" To which he replied, "Masons don't take the oath you last quoted." I then called the attention of the audience to the fact, that the truthfulness of all the other obligations was tacitly testified to by an adhering Mason. He of course denies that he owned anything, but upon demanding a denial he became mute, I then quoted for the purpose of giving him the chance to deny the oath with respect to violating the chastity of the female kindred of Master Masons, when at once he justified that oath on the ground of morality and religion. When again I said, "Then you acknowledge that third degree Masons take that obligation?" He again replied, "I acknowledge no such thing;" after which he practiced true Masonic taciturnity during the remainder of the lecture. I then gave Emma Wallace's smoking-car illustration which fully satisfied the audience of the diabolical nature of the institution.

On the second night we had an increase in the members of the craft, but they preserved their jewel, answering never a word, although I bore down with double vigor upon their system, urging them to volunteer to assist me in the initiatory ceremony of giving the Master's word. The house also called loudly for my friend of the first night to assist in the ceremony, yet there was no response. On Monday night the Patrons of Husbandry turned out in mass, there being a strong representation from three granges, viz., Oceola, Holmes, and Bucyrus. I proceeded to view the grange mainly from a Bible standpoint, which soon caused a fluttering in the ranks, as there are many church members connected with this order. This was the first time that I gave a full lecture exclusively on the question of the grange, and the friends of our cause think it was both appropriate and timely. Since I have been called to participate in the discussion of the grange question in acceptance of a challenge given by one Mr. Bell, of Fulton Co., Indiana. This was pronounced by all to be a most decided triumph for our cause. Mr. Bell being on the affirmative, and having thereby the advantage of the closing plea, was so completely routed and crestfallen that he yielded the question without making the closing plea. It is proper to say in this connection that Mr. G. W. Park, a farmer in Holmes Township, Crawford Co., rendered valuable assistance in both instances on the grange question. Making a half-hour's speech each time, dealing in the statistics of the grange mainly, showing it to be a curse instead of a blessing to the farming community. I regard Mr. Park as a valuable accession to our phalanx of lecturers and bespeak for him the patronage of all who are in want of lectures upon the subject of anti-secrecy.

At the close of the debate on the grange question I was invited, and a vote was taken to give two more lectures in the same house (Bucyrus township) on the general interest of anti-secrecy, which comes off to-morrow night and next night. I have just been informed by letter from Mr. Park that two other points are waiting anxiously for more of the same sort on the grange question. And so it goes, the battle the meanwhile waxing hotter and hotter.

I am expecting a good time at our convention on the 17th and 18th inst. May the Lord come up with all those who may attend on the occasion. We have a most formidable foe in the minions of the dark orders, and "by our God" only can we run through this troop and leap over this wall. More anon.

D. S. CALDWELL.

Lectures in Medina Co., O.

We had the pleasure of listening to an address, delivered at Poe, on Friday evening, the 15th of Jan. last, by Mr. Samuel Hale, of York, Medina Co., O., on the secrets of Masonry. Quite a large audience was present and good attention was given to the speaker. Mr. Hale commenced at the beginning of the history of the order of Masons, showing by arguments introvertable, the utter fallacy of their pretensions to the ancient embodiment of the order; that they have, and are continually trying to clothe their proceedings with the garments of Christianity, thereby covering up multitudes of their iniquities. The speaker then took up the degrees of the lodge, from Alpha to Omega; explained forcibly and to the point, the peculiarities of each degree; tore to pieces their oaths (we might almost say, incantations), and showed the brutality and inhumanity in the initiation of its members. Opened up the subject of their boasted benevolence, and illustrated from personal observations, some very peculiar ways of showing benevolence to their brother Masons, especially when the last cow was gobbled up to pay back dues, and the owner thereof allowed to become as a beggar, and ending his days in the "poorhouse." He then spoke on the effect Masonry has on the political interests of our country. He charged the order with many grave and astounding treasonable acts. Said at their door lay the prolongation of the late rebellion and backed it up with arguments that could not be successfully refuted. Charged the order with controlling the issue of all parties in order to accomplish their end. In short, he illustrated to every thinking and unbiased mind, the great power that Masonry is holding in our land; that its influence, if not checked and crushed, will eventually prove the destruction of our government, and the ruin of the American people.

Jottings from the New York Field.

LISBON, St. Lawrence Co., Jan. 29.

DEAR K:—My last left me on the wing for Ellenburg, but I must pause to give some matters I picked up while at West Chazy. While giving my lectures there I was informed that the lodge was to have a lecturer on hand next week, who would probably heal up the wounds I was making. He came the next Monday and remained that week, and most, if not all the week following; the lodge being open every night, and some of the time during the day; but no "cowans" so far as I could learn, were invited to listen to the instructions given.

Bro. Wardner sent over a written challenge to the lecturer to come into the light and debate with us, but received no answer. Meeting the master of the lodge, a Dr. Honsinger, a few days later Bro. W. told him of the challenge sent, and inquired, "Why don't your man accept the challenge and send a reply?". All the answer he received was: "Do you think he's green enough for that?"

In this place lived, a short time since, Gen. Ira P. Chamberlain, who had been Worshipful Master of the lodge. At length he was brought to his death-bed. Now was the time for the craft to show their benevolence, which was done promptly, not by taking turns and watching by the bedside of their dying Past Master, or by calling upon, or even permitting his neighbors to do it, but by employing a hired nurse—one of the craft,—who, it is asserted by the relatives, often made such mistakes in the use of the stimulants provided for the sick room as to pour them into the wrong mouth; in consequence of which, nurse sometimes got asleep during the night watches, and, in order that he might not be disturbed by the dying patient, he used to tie him to his bed, by lashings passed over him and under the bed, so that in his tossings he might not get off his couch!

While I was there, Bro. Warden, being a guardian for the daughter of the deceased craftsman, had occasion to go before the surrogate, to attend to settling up the affairs of the estate. The brother of the General had the matter in charge, and is also a Mason. Bro. Wardner was surprised to learn that the lodge had charges against the small estate of these four orphan children, of over $130.00, of which $65.00 was to go this brotherly (!) nurse, the brother of the deceased General, and the uncle of these children, bringing in and pressing these claims in favor of the lodge. Bro. Wardner, as guardian for one of these children, of course protested against these claims, asserting that the lodge had employed this nurse, and thus practically said to the neighbors, "Keep your hands off; we run this machine. See how benevolent we are!" This was the understanding, through the neighborhood, and so the neighbors and friends left the dying man to the tender mercies of those, who, by virtue of their mystic ties, considered themselves the nearest kin to the sufferer. But this charge upon the estate, for such benevolent services, caused the friends to open their eyes wide. The charge, however, was allowed, the brother saying that the lodge did pay the nurse $2.00 a night, while the $65.00 charged against the estate, was for day service, at the rate of $2.50 per day. Thus charging fifty cents more for day service than for nightly. This looked rather queer; more generally being required for night, than for day service. But when we remember that the nurse could lash his patient to the bed, and thus sleep during the night, we can see the reasonableness of the charge. Thus does lodge benevolence display itself in our day.

At the close of my lectures, a town association for the town of Chazy, opposed to secret societies, was formed, with Bro. Wardner at its head, in whose hands was left a call for a county convention to be published as soon as a sufficient number of names can be attached to make it a success.

On the morning of the 15th inst., I was on the cars, and away in the morning twilight for Moore's Junction. After waiting a few moments here, the Vermont Central train came along, heading west. As I went on board, and took my seat, I noticed many eyes turned toward the rear of the car. Looking in the same direction, I saw a young woman, I should judge of about 30 years, of rather attractive appearance, occupying a seat with a young man, who seemed rather enamored with his fair companion. Indeed, from a cursory examination, I judged that a mutual admiration society had been formed between the two. While wondering why these should attract so much attention, a gentleman in front of me said, "That is Ann Eliza, Brigham Young's nineteenth wife!" I cast another glance at the lady, now so famous, and was at no loss in understanding why Brigham should place the nineteenth part of his affections on Ann Eliza, or why Ann Eliza should turn up her pretty nose at the nineteenth part of a man, and he some 70 years of age! Everybody in the car soon had their eyes on the couple, who took occasion, at a stopping place, to change cars.

Without further incident, worthy of note, I at length found myself at Ellenburg depot, where I expected to find a friend in waiting; but he was not there. I allowed the stage to depart without me, and waited two or three hours for my friends. At length the stage driver again entered the depot, and said in reply to the agent's inquiry as to why he returned, "I went off and left the male;" and while the agent was looking about, I saw by a twinkle of the driver's eye, that the "male" he had left was under my coat and "fixings," so I wrapped up and started in an open cutter for Ellenburg Center, facing a wind which set my teeth clattering like castanets. O that cold ride, may I never see its like again! On reaching the Center I was informed that I was yet to face this wind two or three miles farther, and all the way up hill. This part of the ride was worse than the first, but I bore it as heroically as possible, hoping to have a good time among my Wesleyan friends, who would of course appreciate my labors and compensate me therefor. But I had another lesson to learn. That same fearful disease I alluded to in a former letter, I found raging at West Ellenburg. I found, however, a hospitable shelter, with a Mr. and Mrs. Hall, who did all in their power to make me comfortable. Mrs. Hall is a member of the Wesleyan church, whose house of worship stands a few rods from her home.

In the evening I went to the meeting-house and found but few present. The pastor of the church was there, and reluctantly opened the meeting with prayer. He had his donation the previous evening, and expressed his fears that the giving out of the lectures at that time would hurt his receipts." Only one of his male members was present at the lectures and that was the sexton, and he seemed to be a true man, and a true Wesleyan. On the Saturday morning our pastor took his wife and started for his Sunday appointment in another neighborhood. He called in where I was making my home, and asked me to preach for him in the church on the following morning. Sister Hall said to him, "I am ashamed of our Wesleyans, that they did not come to the lecture last night." He hesitated a moment, and then said by way of explanation—as though it had just occurred to him—"Well, you know some folks are weak-kneed," and walked off, leaving the company smiling at his apparent ignorance of the adaptation of his remark to himself. Poor man! the Wesleyan church is no place for such as he. They want men of sterner stuff than he is made of. The more the denomination has of his stamp, the poorer it will be.

The evening following, I spoke again to a much larger audience, most of them coming from a distance, while members of the church living close by staid at home, or went to another meeting some two or three miles away. Rev. S. Phelps and another preaching brothing brother (Wesleyan) were present, and gave me all the assistance in their power. "May their shadows never grow less." At the close of the service a collection was taken to meet my expenses and resulted in 84 cents! Considering the condition of the thermometer, this was very favorable. Before closing, a gentleman rose and asked if he understood me to say that "a man could not be a Mason and be a Christian?" I told him if he did, he misunderstood me, as I asserted no such thing. What I did say was that no man "could believe the teachings of Masonry and be a Christian." He said that he owned a hall at the Centre, and that he would warm and light it and discuss that question with me, giving me a challenge to that effect, and saying in the meantime that he was not a Mason. That being the case, I declined the challenge, as I could see nothing to be gained by such a debate, for the craft would laugh at us both, saying that neither of us knew what we were talking about; but that if he would bring a Mason whom the lodge would endorse, as their mouth-piece, I would meet him. The gentleman—for gentleman he showed himself to be—then offered me his hall to lecture in. I regretted exceedingly that my engagements prevented me accepting his offer at once. I, however, promised to test his kindness at my earliest convenience.

The next morning found me in the pulpit, where I tried to preach the "glorious Gospel of the Son of God." Bro. Phelps was present, and after service took me home with him to South Ellenburg, where I preached in the evening to a full house, on the religion of Masonry. Here something over three dollars was given me, and the heart atmosphere was much warmer.

Monday morning early, found me on the road for a cold nine miles ride to the depot, with Bro. P., whose kindness I shall not soon forget; nor shall I, any more, that of Bro. Wright, or the Halls, whose efforts for my comfort while with them were unceasing. Once more on the cars, I soon bad adieu to Ellenburg. Out of the town and out of the county, I am borne westward to Melone, the capitol of Franklin county. It was here that Elder Colver renounced and denounced Masonry. I found some in this, as in Clinton Co. who had known him. I hope to pick up some reminiscence of him, in this section, ere long.

After waiting awhile in Malone, I was found and taken in charge by a Bro. Learned, a Wesleyan, who is not ashamed of his principles, or afraid to proclaim them. He took me away another nine miles in an open sleigh to his home, gave me a good dinner, and the not very gratifying information tha I had a ride of three miles yet before me, ere I reached my place of labor. Here I must close my narrative for the present, assuring our friends that the coming letter will be more interesting than anything I have yet written.

Wellington, Ill., Jan. 30, '75.

Editor Cynosure:—Rev. H. H. Hinman, our State Agent, has been lecturing with us for the last few days and has been giving quite general satisfaction. Of course the Masons, their aiders and abettors were not altogether pleased, and on one or two evenings made considerable noise, and yet even the noise these fellows make is not a bad omen for us, for the reason that those who are noisy only, are not to be dreaded so much as those who are sullen and keep their jewel, a silent tongue.

Mr. Hinman gave two lectures at Fountain Creek U. B. Church, one lecture at Wellington, and two lectures at Hoopeston. With moral, religious and well-meaning people his lecture on the "Religion of Masonry" has a wonderful effect. We have been cursed (for such we think it is) with Masonic preachers in this part of the country, but we are happy to believe their star is fast setting in the western horizon.

The Masons and Odd-fellows, during an evening or two when these lectures were being delivered, tried to get up disturbance, but this would perhaps all have been avoided but for the "sod corn" they had been imbibing too freely in a liquid state. On one evening a challenge for a debate was given and accepted, the debate to be conducted in a hall or church in Hoopeston last Friday evening, but when the time came the "orders" failed to furnish their man, although beforehand there was no end to the boasting and noise they made; but they undoubtedly concluded, and wisely too, that discretion was the better part of valor.

I think the field and demand for anti-lodge lectures is widing generally in all this country. When the time shall have arrived that many shall run to and fro, then we may expect that knowledge shall be increased, and this "knowledge" or light will work the utter ruin of the lodges, for they represent the darkness, and light and darkness having no affinity, the darkness must and will of necessity give place to the light.

Respectfully yours,
J. S. Hickman.

Grand Lodge Patch-work.

YATES CITY, Ill., Jan. 22, 1875.

MR. EDITOR;—In my last letter published in your paper, I think I said that probably no one except members of the Grand Lodge knew how the charges made by J. H. Nicholson against Benj. Kersey were disposed of. I am now able to inform you how the matter was postponed, for at least one year, and at the end of that time Kersey will not be under the jurisdiction of the Grand Lodge of Illinois. I have seen the Grand Secretary's report of the proceedings of the Grand Lodge with reference to that case. The committee on Appeals and Grievances say: . . . "It appears upon examination that the lodge was perfectly satisfied that the charges were false and could not be sustained. We therefore recommend that Bro. Nicholson have leave to withdraw his charges." The recommendation of the committee was concurred in by the G. L. It appears thus to me and others upon examination: when J. W. Hensley, W. M. of Yates City Lodge, refused to go before the committee, Past Master W. H. Eastman was the only witness left for them to examine. He of course pretended that the lodge was perfectly satisfied. But he admitted that he could not tell the whole truth in the matter without criminating himself. This admission on the part of Eastman satisfied the committee that he instead of Benj. Kersey removed the black-balls from the box preparatory to voting on the petition of Thos. Kersey to be made a Mason. And they expressed their private opinion unofficially to other Masons and it has been communicated through a perfectly reliable Masonic channel to me. I am therefore prepared to furnish first rate references in case of emergency.

My Experience.

WOODHULL, N. Y.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I moved into this town 26 years ago and found two Baptist churches in our small village, neither having a meeting house. They once had one church, but as soon as the Odd-fellows and Freemasons established lodges here there was a great commotion, as some of the members joined the craft. It caused a separation. The Anti-masonic element setting up for themselves, and went on for a few years harmoniously and increased and prospered, till the Sons of Temperance and Good Templars started up, and their influence was brought to bear to slacken their zeal. The time now arrived for the old church to make a proposition to the new one to unite and become one church. So a meeting was called and a union formed on the arrangement that Masons could be kept out without any resolutions.

Now for the result. The union was formed in the year 1858, and since that time they have had three different Masonic preachers and have taken in Masons as members of the church without any renunciation, and one of the present Masons of the church has held the office of Master of the lodge. I am trying to get subscribers for the Cynosure. I send the petition with 34 names of legal voters. I have no fellowship with any church that admits Masonry. PHILO MILLARD.

A Note of Thanks.

DUNCAN, Ill., Feb. 1, 1875.

Editors Christian Cynosure:

I embrace this moment of time and this method that I may extend to the brethren of our church (United Brethren) and especially to Bro. H. C. Stoughton, one of our local preachers, my almost inexpressible thanks for the generous and interesting New Year's gift, the Christian Cynosure. I am proud of this gift; and I am proud of the fact that I have such brethren to live amongst. May God bless them in theirs, and you in your good work. Amen. REV. G. H. VARCO.

OUR MAIL.

C. D. Coppock, Quarry, Ia., writes:

"S. Smith, of Iona, Iowa, called to see old friends last fall and gave us one lecture on Masonry. It was plain and sharp. It made the Masons wrathy, and I think did much good. I would like to have some one that is able to give us a call and lecture for us at Le Grand. It is a strong settlement of friend Quakers, and they are almost unanimously opposed to secretism; but they are a people that move slow and cautiously. They need something to arouse them to action.

Cinda Chapin, Jefferson, Ia., writes:

"This is a flourishing place for Masons and grangers, and it is hard to get anyone to read the paper. Some who are not Masons cannot say anything against Masonry because they are grangers. My father was a young man in the time when Morgan was killed, and I have often heard him talk about it. He was a strong Anti-mason and tried to bring his children up the same way, and also to be Christians."

Merchant Kelly, Bentonville, Ind., writes:

"Ten years ago I knew but one active Anti mason in Indiana. Now there are thousands To-morrow (Oct. 13, 1874) is to be our State election, and in this county, I expect only one Mason will be elected. Two candidates for Congress from this district had a joint discussion here a few days ago. I told each of them that I was a voter, and they were candidates one of which was to be elected, and I and others had a right to know whether they belonged to a secret society. One of them said "No," and that he was willing to state the fact under a legally administered oath that he did not and never did belong to a secret society. The other gentleman who many years ago helped make the present Indiana constitution, and who has been to Congress for fourteen years past, said (when I asked him if he belonged to Masonry) "I can't say." I told him he could say yes or no, and I and many others had a right to know and wanted to know the truth about it. After a few moments of apparent perplexity he again said, "I can't say." Well, then, said I, I and many others will not vote for you because we do not consider you free to tell the truth and act rightly at all times, consequently not fit for any office under our government. I believe he will not get any votes about here. . . . Thus all candidate should, in public, be questioned."

Rev. S. C. Kimball, Gifford Village, N. H, writes:

"There is hope even for New Hampshire. The truth is gaining ground."

Mary C. Gerrard, Mt. Vernon, Ia., sends some earnest words deploring the infidelity and false religions of our times, and quotes the following lines:

"Watchman tell me does the morning
Of fair Zion's glory dawn?
Have the signs which marked its coming,
Yet upon thy pathway shone?

Pilgrim! yes, arise, look around thee,
Light is breaking in the skies,
Spurn the unbelief that bounds thee,
Morning dawns, arise, arise."

Thomas A. Sprouil, New Alexandria, Pa., writes:

"I have seen enough to know that all secret orders are unchristian, intensely selfish, and wholly antagonistic to republican institutions. May the time soon come when they shall be entirely destroyed. May God succeed your efforts to secure this result."

Ira D. Van Scoyoc, York Springs, Pa., writes:

"Mr. H. J. Harmon and I have procured fifty-eight names on the legal voter's petition, and twenty-six on the other. Nearly all the women are anti-secret, but a great many would not sign a petition under any circumstances. I thought at first I would not secure more than twenty-five names, but the more they are waked up the better they bite. The Masons try to avoid all talk on the subject. The Odd-fellows, that is, quite a number of them, think we are meddling too much in other people's business. They tried to scare me (as they called it) by threatening to prosecute me for slandering them, (which I did not do) so they thought their best plan would be to keep quiet, which they are doing now. There are a great many men that I saw that are Anti-masons that would not sign the petition. The most of them said if an anti-secret ticket came out they would vote it. We need a few good lecturers in this part of the country before we can get very many subscribers for your paper or signers for petitions. Of those names that we procured four belonged to secret orders. Mr. H. J. Harmon had taken four degrees in Odd-fellowship. He says that (Odd-fellowship Illustrated) is a correct exposition as far as he had gone. He is one of our best workers."

M. A. Clarke, Jr., Pella, Ia., writes:

"I am a member of the Second Baptist Church of this place which is organized in opposition to secret societies. It is made up of good substantial Christians who stand up for the truth and fear not the opinion of men. The location is good in the heart of Iowa, forty-six miles west of Ottumwa, the railroad center of the State, forty-five miles east of the capitol. I don't see much difference in the particulars from any other part of the State. It has all the advantages of a good fertile country. Secret societies are tolerably well represented here, and the grange as usual has swept over the country like the grasshoppers in Kansas, and they are losing faith in the beloved institution, and it has impoverished the State. In my opinion they have lost more than they have gained in their headlong rush for gain. May the day soon come when all will know the character of these institutions of darkness and crime, and as some one has well said, 'workshops of Satan's votaries' May God help the cause along and bless every means used to enlighten the people that sit in darkness. I am in favor of Ottumwa for our next convention, and one delegate if not more will be there from here. We are ripe for a lecture here, and will have somebody as soon as we can make arragements. I hope that the State generally will come to the support of those who lead in the struggle for somebody has to lead in all the movements."

Joseph Keel, Sr., Boliviar, O., sends the names of one hundred legal voters and one hundred and twenty-five others (two hundred and twenty-five) and writes:

"I send you the result in regard to the petitions sent me. I might have done more, but considering my age, bordering now on my three score and ten, I am truely thankful to my heavenly Father that he helped me to accomplish so much. O Lord, how long? Our editors, our doctors, our preachers and bishops, our mighty men upon the great questions of Freemasonry and kindred evils, are dumb, and dare not and will not speak. The Lord pity them, open the eyes of their understanding, convict and convert them, that they may see and act right. How long, O Lord, how Long? But I must mention a circumstance that took place the last day of my work on the petition, which I think is worthy of note; at any rate it paid me richly for all my labor. It was storming, blowing, raining and snowing. I entered a school-house, accompanied by John Miller, of Pike Town, one of the directors, who gave both me and my petition an introduction to the teacher, a young man of perhaps some twenty-two or three years, neither of us knowing what his sentiments were. I handed him my petition; he read it; wanted some explanation; I gave it; then to my astonishment took the center of the floor, bell in hand, called the school to order. In a moment they were all seated as quite as mice. Holding up the petition, he said: Do I understand Mr. Keel that the purport of this petition is to wipe out the accursed thing? Said I, if I understand the words of that good and great statesman, Daniel Webster, that is the object. He then read it aloud to his school, then said he: My dear scholars I am your teacher and hold in my hand a petition to Congress to wipe out one of the greatest evils now prevailing in this, once glorious land of liberty and freedom, and if not put down we shall lose it all. I will lead the way, and as many of you young men and women as wish can sign. It will be one good step to keep you from ever being entangled in their meshes. He gave us quite a good little lecture for a boy. He said he was sorry to say that he had one brother belonging to the lodge; that he was the blackest sheep in the flock. But I must stop. I was very much gratified and feel like praising God from whom all blessings flow, and of course invoked the blessing of heaven upon this young man, and bid him adue. His name, E. B. Bauch. O that we had more such exemplery teachers."

With v. 6, read Num. xiii. 6; with v. 7, Prov. xiv. 5; with v. 8, Pro. xiv. 25; with v. 9, Deut. i. 36; with vs. 10 and 11, Ps. xcii. 12-15; with v. 12, Ps. lvi. 11; with v. 13, Josh. xv. 13; with vs. 14 and 15, Gen. xxiii. 2.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If any man serve me him will my Father honor. John xii. 26.

CENTRAL TRUTH.—He is faithful who hath promised.

SUGGESTIVE TOPICS.—The purpose of the spies—number—report—minority—the tribes Caleb and Joshua represented—the promise concerning Caleb—how certified (v. 9)—by what authority Moses sware (v. 6)—the supporters of Caleb's claim (v. 6)—on what ground—Caleb's age when sent as spy—when making this claim—how long in Canaan—the place claimed—ground of it (v. 12 compared with Numb. xiv. 24—(the history of Hebron before this—after it—other name—its antiquity—Caleb's gratitude—his confidence (v. 12)—his reception by Joshua—the grant—the former occupants of the place—the lessons we may learn—value of truth—the virtues Caleb displayed—nature of following the Lord—certainty of the reward, and ground of this certainty.

We must go far back to have this record in a clear and orderly way in our minds. As early as the time of Abraham, Kirjath-arba (seven hours south of Jerusalem), was a place of consequence. Mamre was probably near it, the name, perhaps, of its sacred grove, and sometimes used for it. Its name is either from Arba, a leading man of the Anakims, or from its being a leading place (father-city, like "mother-church"). The Anakims in three divisions (Numb. xiii. 22) had taken possession of it. Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai are, likely, family names, not individuals (sea Josh. xv. 14). The place was extremely ancient (see Numb. xiii. 22), "built seven years before Zoan in Egypt," possibly by the same people and apparently with great strength. The place was called Kiricarba in the 14th century, and had then also a separate Jewish name. It is still a considerable country-town. This place had been visited by the spies sent by Moses (Numb. xiii. 8); and its strength and the seeming force of the Anakims dismayed the majority of them (vs. 19, 20). Hence they reported most unfavorably on their return (vs. 32, 33), and a mutiny arose, with the most disastrous results, detailed in Numb. xiv. Two men only saw with the eyes of saints and courageous followers of the Lord, Caleb and Joshua. Caleb seems to have taken a firm, positive stand (Numb. xiii. 30). This the Lord noticed (xiv. 24), and communicated by Moses, his firm purpose ("sware," v. 9), to give him an inheritance in the land. Our lesson is the continuation of this history, and would be unintelligible without it.—S. S. World.

Joshua was now "well stricken in years," and there remained yet very much land to be possessed. (xii. 1.) God had given to Moses directions concerning the division of Canaan among the tribes. Num. xxvi. 53–56. Moses had also designated who should attend to this distribution and allotment. Num. xxxiv. 16–29. There were to be Eleazer the priest and Joshua, assisted by "one prince" from every tribe. Caleb, of the tribe of Judah, was one of the persons named. Although there was yet much land to be conquered, it was already time that the whole country should be districted, and each tribe receive its portion. But first, it was proper that Caleb, to whom had been promised a special inheritance, should have it formally bestowed upon him. Accordingly, Caleb, accompanied by representatives of his tribe—Judah—came to Joshua in Gilgal. The meeting of these two veterans, whose names had now for twenty-five years or more been so honorably associated, must have been full of interest. Caleb was probably a man of less ability and culture than his ancient friend, but of no whit less integrity, moral courage and true character. That had been thoroughly tested when they were sent by Moses from Kadesh to spy out the land. The study of Caleb's character, as it comes out in this lesson, may be expected to produce a marked impression. He was a sort of man which our own times urgently call for. On one point, at least, we shall find him a splendid model for all.—Ill. Bible Studies.

Followed the Lord.—That is, in faith, believing that by God's help, these nations would soon be destroyed. He does not mention certain other creditable things in this affair, as his efforts to quiet the tumult of the people, rending his clothes as a protest against their sin, and his narrow escape from stoning at their hands. The absence, too, of any compliments respecting Joshua's part in this matter, marks vividly the simple, honest character of Caleb. He looks upon Joshua and himself as having merely done their duty. Comp. Luke xvii. 10.

We are called upon sometimes to declare our integrity, 2 Cor. i. 12; Acts xx. 18–35; Ps. cxix. 161–168.

The faithful servant of Christ often finds his greatest trial to consist in the reproach and opposition of his brethren. Jer. xliii. 1–7; Lam. iii. 14; 2 Cor. xii. 15.

He who flinches from reproach, on account of any Bible truth, is not a good soldier. Yet remember the caution, 2 Tim. ii. 24, 25.—Evangelical Repository.

Now let us see the points to be remembered in this lesson.

I. Learn the value of truth-telling.—Caleb was sincere and truthful. He was in a minority of two to ten, but he held to the truth. And he did this in the face of danger, for stoning was proposed (Numb. xiv. 10).

Men lie in politics, trade, in religion, even in courtesy. They go with the crowd; are insincere, running down, or exalting men, as it is the humor of the time to do. The ninth commandment forbids lying, either for or against our neighbor. A lie is an insult to God, a denial of his knowing all. Society is built on truth between man and man, and it falls to pieces as fruit falls. "Lie not one to another" (Col. iii. 9).

II. The ground on which to stand up for truth:—"Following the Lord fully." It is the same principle as in Joseph's case (Gen. xxxix. 9). See Psalm xvi. 8. He directs in the world. He is to be followed, even through discomfort, danger and death. To think of the honor that cometh from men, hinders not only the doing, but the believing of the truth. (See John v. 44.) Following the Lord was the sign of discipleship in the New Testament. (See Hosea vi. 3.) The way to learn is to follow (Eph. v. 1), "followers of God, as children," and Rev. xvi 4.

III. God notices and appropriately rewards true followers.—So Caleb was spared, and received this inheritance. It was a reward in the way of his duty, as punishment came on the murmurers in the way of their sin. (See Numb. xiv. 22, 23.) "The eyes of the Lord are on the righteous." Obey God in common things, and natural rewards come; in spiritual, and spiritual rewards are given.

IV. The reward may be long deferred.—So faith is exercised (Heb. xi. 27). So patience is displayed (Heb. vi. 15). So God would have us "wait patiently for him" (Ps. xxxvii. 7). See also James i. 3. Faith rests on the word of God. Caleb pleads the promise of God. So do true suppliants to him (Ps. cxix. 49). This faith does not prevent our using fitting means. Caleb claimed his right at Joshua's hands.

V. The reward is sure.—God cannot lie. So Caleb found it. So do all the faithful (1 Pet. i. 3–5). "God is not unrighteous" (Heb. vi. 10). Yet is it a reward not of debt, but of grace, for the Lord helps his people to serve, promises the reward, and gives it abundantly. See David, 1 Chron. xxix. 12–14, and John x. 10.

VI. "But," you think, "I can have no chance to be faithful like Caleb, there is no land to be reported upon now." There you mistake. Every Christian says in effect: "I have seen the Lord, I have become his, I am of his family;" and all men watch us to see what "report" we bring of it. If we are mean, selfish, intensely anxious to get a portion in this life, caring little about God, his worship, house, service, if we be morose, gloomy, fretful, peevish, discontented grumblers, they will be apt to think meanly of our position and treatment, and prospects, and so unworthily of our Lord. Let us not bring "an evil report." Let us have a hopeful, happy, bright, genial Christian life. Let us think little of what we give up for Christ, and a great deal of what he gives us; we shall not lose our reward.—S. S. World.

The Secret Character of the B'nai B'rith.

At the annual meeting of the District Grand Lodge, No. 6, of the Israelitish order of B'nai B'rith held lately in Chicago, Rev. Dr. B. Felthensal, a Jewish rabbi, presented a minority report from some committee in which he prophesies a change from the secret and fantastic features of the order. These are his reasons: 1. In the first period of its history, the order had a considerable number of officers who gloried in the possession of high-sounding, nevertheless very ridiculous titles. There were a Grand Sar, and a Grand Maskir, and an Amarkel, and a Gisber, and a number of Skenim, etc. The Amerkel and the Gisber and the Skenim went overboard in 1863; and the Sar and Maskir had to follow in 1868. Yet the Grand Nesi Abh (with his nonsensical and ungrammatical title), the Gr. Alluf (with his title borrowed from the Edomitic heathens), the Gr. Yoez, the Gr. Shomer, the Gr. Baal Hagginze, and the Gr. Sopher were then allowed to remain. But alas! they, too, had now to go the way of all the living. The convention held a year ago has done a creditable act in freeing the order from another of the ludicrous romantic remnants of the past, and in the future our Sarim and Yoezim and Allunm will only be remembered in connection with another titled personage of a romantic world, with the noble Knight of dela Mancha, and they will only reappear in all their peacock-splendor in Jewish masquarade-balls and in Purim-comedias.

Sic transit gloria mundi. All this poetic halo which surrounded the heads of all the officers in former years has now vanished into the air, has disappeared totally, has gone, gone, gone, and never, never will it return.

2. Another illustration of decays and changes within the order offers itself to us in the regalia question. There are such amongst us who are so long connected with the order that they will remember the time when everyone in the lodge-room had to wear an apron and something in the shape of a horse-collar, and when, besides this, the officers had caps, peculiarly shaped, upon their heads, something similar to a Turkish fez. Where are these regalias now? Where are they? Since about twelve years they have no legal existence any more, and all the efforts made in some districts to regain them and to force them again upon the brotherhood at large have proved unavailing. What still remains of these antiquities is, indeed, very meager and insignificant. "The officers will clothe themselves with insignia of their respective offices,"—so the president reminds these gentlemen at the opening of the meetings, and the officers comply. But how? The uniformity has ceased long ago. In some lodges they have some velvet horse-collars, in others they have plain badges fastened on the lappels of their coats, in others the officers satisfy their conscience by the legal fiction of sticking a common pin in their coat. It is natural that such rotten and decayed things should be treated with ignominy and contempt, and should be explained away in any manner possible.

3. There is another notable instance which we cannot forgo of quoting, proving the astonishing progress the order has made within the last few years. The order, imitating other orders previously existing, was originally created as a strictly secret order. But the barriers of secrecy have been gradually removed. In 1863, for the first time, the general convention held its sessions with open doors. Soon thereafter the D. G. L. No. 6 was called into existence, and from its beginning this Grand Lodge had open sessions. In 1874 the general convention took another step towards the total abolition of the secret character of the order. Under the existing state of things, only the ritualistic work of the lodges is to be gone through secretly and with closed doors. Whether the non-ritualistic part of the transactions should be done in secret is left optional with the lodges. There is not the least doubt whatsoever that the same reasons which caused the court of appeals six years ago to declare the open meetings of our own D. G. L. admissable and lawful, hold good in every similar case.

Thus remains, then, only one restriction, viz.: the opening and closing prayers and the admonitions and instructions given at the occasion of conferring degrees and installing officers have to be spoken, (resp.) imparted, while the doors are hermetrically closed. But just for this restriction, no rational reason can be brought forward. While certain business transactions, in consequence of their delicate nature, require privacy (privacy is the word, not secrecy), the beautiful instructions and admonitions are the very part of the lodge doings which ought to be given, solemnly and impressively, before all the world. But then the order would be rid of something decidedly un-Jewish, aye, even anti-Jewish, and would be in harmony with the spirit and history of Judaism. Our talmudical sages have already called attention to the fact that the laws of Torah were promulgated "demos parresia;" that is to say, openly and before the people (Mechitta Tr. Ba'hodesh, chap. 1). And, still earlier, the voice of God said by the mouth of his inspired prophet: Lo bassether dibbarti, &c. Not in mysteries and secrecies did I speak, nor in hidden places. (Isaiah xlv. 19; comp. ib. xlviii. 16). If despite of this a number of so-religionists cling with such a great tenacity to the secret character of the order, and maintain thereby a feature of the same, which necessarily must be characterized as belonging to the category of "Kukkoth Haggoyim," the fact must be explained as a consequence either of ignorance of the spirit of Judaism, or of willful rebellion against it. We hail, therefore, with gratification the fact that such an influential paper as The American Israelite has denounced repeatedly and manfully in strong terms the secret character of the order. These and similar endeavors to create more enlightened views will, we hope, gradually convince and convert even such who appear to-day as advocates of closed doors.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEB. 11, 1875.

THE U. P. CHURCH: AMAZING!—Our readers know that the United Presbyterian church, one of the most sound and evangelical bodies of Christian people in this or any country, is committed by its "Book" against the secret orders; and that the Senate of its College at Monmouth, since our meeting there, has passed a clear and explicit order against those bantlings of the lodge, college secret societies, or "Greek Fraternities. Now Mr. Rentoul, of Philadelphia, assures us that the U. P. Presbytery of Philadelphia, Jan. 12th, ult., by a tie vote, refused to sustain an appeal from the North church in Philadelphia, against admitting an adhering Odd-fellow to fellowship, who refused, after laboring with him, to forsake his lodge. The case is appealed to Synod, and must, we think, ultimately go against the double connection of their members with lodge and church.

But the worst of all is, Mr. Rentoul charges that the official minutes of the Presbytery now published, contained no record of or allusion to the case of this Odd-fellow, and the action of Presbytery thereon! We hope for the honor of our common Christianity, and of the United Presbyterian church, that Mr. Rentoul is mistaken, and that such is not the fact. If it is, how can that Presbytery hold up its head for very shame, when the case comes up in Synod? or do they mean to squelch it, and deny Elders Robert E. Elliot and John Spratt their right of appeal? If they do, we predict that this strange action will be reprobated and reversed, or the court fall into contempt. Will Dr. Barr or some member of the Presbytery give us light?

"IN THE TWILIGHT."—The Religious Telescope is informed that Mr. Dougall's New York Witness imputed to Mr. Talmage the editorial on "Curious and Secret Arts," which should have been credited to the Telescope; and the Cynosure copied the error from the New York paper. In the columns of the Telescope the article in question would be quite out of the "twilight," as the church of which it is the organ has long excluded Freemasonry from fellowship; and every reader would know that by "secret arts" substituted for God's open method's it would mean the arts of the lodge; while the same words in the lips of a popular preacher might only be an allusion to what he dare not name. By the way, our old-time friend, Dr. Thomas E. Thomas, of Lane Seminary, is said to have alluded in Synod to the lodge as "THE GODLESS APE OF THE BRIDE OF CHRIST!" And the scathing sentence is so like the original and resplendent genius of Dr. Thomas, that we are willing to believe him the author of it. Perhaps the Telescope can tell us whether he is. If so, he deserves our benizons. We know that Dr. Thomas does, or did, loathe the lodge and its "books of curious arts," as Paul loathed those at Ephesus.

NATIONAL PRESBYTERIAN CONFERENCE.

In the last days of January two committees met in Baltimore, one representing the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church North, the other that of the church South, to procure interchange of delegates, and final reunion of the two General Assemblies. The split thus sought to be healed occurred as described in the following action of the body North:

WHEREAS, During the existence of the great rebellion, which has disturbed the peace and threatened the life of the nation, a large number of presbyteries and synods in the Southern States, whose names are on the roll of the General Assembly as constituent parts of this body, have organized an assembly entitled "The General Assembly of the Confederate States of America," in order to render their aid in the attempt to establish, by means of rebellion, a separate national existence, and "to conserve and perpetuate the system of slavery;" therefore,

Resolved, That this Assembly regards the civil rebellion for the perpetuation of negro slavery as a great crime, both against our national government and against God, and the secession of those presbyteries and synods from the Presbyterian church, under such circumstances and for such reasons, as unwarranted, schismatical, and unconstitutional.—[Minutes of 1863, p. 560.

The Southern Committee haughtily required a repeal or disapproval of the above action as a condition of interchange of delegates. The Northern Committee declined, and the conference broke up leaving the two Assemblies, as before, in their attitude of non-intercourse.

Slavery split the General Assembly into Old and New School in 1837–8. This disruption was immediately caused by "The excinding act of 1837 by which four synods, five hundred ministers, and a Presbyterian population of some sixty thousand were cut off. A youth in Philadelphia, I witnessed the passing of "The excinding act," and heard W. S. Plummer, D. D., then of Virginia, urge as a reason in favor of cutting off the New York and Western Reserve Synods, that their ministers "used to ride to Presbytery with their saddle-bags stuffed with Anti-masonic Almanacs." Political Anti-masonry had ceased to exist as a party some five or six years before; but, even then, the lodge was lifting its snake-head in the General Assembly and hissing on the violent disruption of that body. And it is notorious that the South was then, and ever since has been ruled by the lodge; that its Masonic halls were the hot-beds of the rebellion, and the lodges the caucuses of the Confederacy.

Presbyterianism was originally a religion of principle, sprung from the great protest against popery and its idolatry and despotism, which are the parents and patterns of the idolatries and despotisms of the lodge. And but few years prior to the disruption of the Assembly the Synod of Cincinnati and of Chilicothe, with other Presbyterian bodies, declared (see their minutes) that "membership in a Masonic lodge is incompatible with a credible profession of the Christian religion." When will Presbyterians learn that a union of General Assemblies with Freemasonry in it is but another Trojan horse with the seeds of certain destruction in itself?

THE SABBATH RECORDER.

This earnest print, the organ of the Seventh-day Baptists, published at Alfred Center, N. Y., compliments the Cynosure for inserting a letter or two, containing the arguments of that denomination for regarding Saturday instead of Sunday as the Christian Sabbath. It yet properly hints to us that we could not go at large into that discussion without injustice to our subscribers, and bad faith to the public. It must therefore excuse us from complying with its invitation to discuss that topic with it.

Suffice it to say that when the Fourth Commandment was uttered from Sinai, "Remember the Sabbath day," it must have taken just eight and forty hours, or two days, Saturday and Sunday, to have obeyed that command around our globe, allowing one hour for each 15 degrees of longtitude. So, for aught we see, Sunday is just as much holy time as Saturday. But it is not the particular time, but the institution which is holy. But we love a sincere child of God who keeps Saturday and believes in our civil law, which, while it forbids Sabbath desecration and requires oaths, makes provision for the consciences of Seventh-day Baptists and Quakers. So, for ought we can see, we can labor together against the idolatries and blasphemies of the lodge as harmoniously as we did against the despotisms and brutalities of slavery. For we know that "the foundation of God standeth sure, having their seal, 'the Lord knoweth them that are his,' and let him that nameth the name of the Lord depart from all iniquity."

But between us and the devotees of the lodge there is a single antagonism and an impassable gulf. For omitting Christ from their creed, as do Masons, Odd-fellows and their dark brood, is the omission of Christianity from all beyond in those orders. They are therefore "another gospel which is not another," and we are commanded to hold all bringers of such to be accursed; while the real children of God, of all denominations, are on the same sure "foundation of the Lord," for which let us bless and serve him together.

OLIVER CROMWELL.

H. G. Spafford, Esq., lectured on Oliver Cromwell in the Wheaton College Chapel to an intensely interested audience on Monday evening, Feb. 2d, inst. We have heard many lecturers since the inauguration of the Lecture system in this country, Gough, Wendell Phillips, Theodore Parker, and Starr King among them, and we do not hesitate to say that Mr. Spafford's lecture on Cromwell equals any lecture we have heard for the ends and purposes for which such efforts are sought. There was indeed but one defect, a slight weakness of voice which failed to carry every word to all parts of the Chapel. The lecture itself is thoroughly American, eloquent, and instructive, and unites the two qualities, strength and popularity, in a degree which ought to carry it through the United States.

In 1843 the friends of popular government erected a monument to John Hampden on Chalgrave Field, where he fell, fighting for the English people against their king. But to this day, the tories are strong, and we may add, mean enough, to refuse to allow a statute of Cromwell within their Senate House. Yet Hampden was the determined foe of monarchy and Cromwell only executed what Hampden wished, fought and died for.

A French monarch and aristocracy allowed the French people to bring the corpse of Napoleon from St. Helena to entomb it in Paris, though he overthrew half the thrones of Europe. An English monarch and aristocracy could dig up the bones of Cromwell and set his skull on a pillory, and their successors endorse the jackal littleness of revenge, by keeping up the ostracism of his memory. But Cromwell's time is coming, and that of the people with it. Mr. Spafford's lecture is of the starlight which precedes the dawn of his fame.

Since hearing Mr. Spafford's lecture, taking up a volume of Hume, the apologist of the Stuarts, and skeptic sycrophant of power and prerogative, we find this to be his first notice of him:

"Oliver Cromwell, at that time a young man of no account in the nation, is mentioned in these debates as complaining of one, who, he was told, preached flat popery. It is amusing to observe the first words of this fanatical hypocrite correspond so exactly to his character."—[Hume, vol. 2, p. 234.

This keynote of a considerable part of his volume which Hume devotes to Cromwell, brief as it is, proves several things: as,

1st. That Cromwell's whole "character" was rigidly consistent with his first public act.

2d. That the war he began was simply that which Bismarck and Gladstone are now carrying out, viz., The people against Jesuitism.

3d. And that Cromwell only wore the same epithets which have been branded on American abolitionists and all friends of human rights ever since the tools and sycophants of power could make them stay.

NOTES.

—An able article on political secrecy is presented this week from an attorney in Ohio. The argument has a particular but indirect application to the grange folly which making large accessions in some parts of that State. The author speaks of the Ku-Klux as fomenting the late war. He probably refers to a late society with another name—the Knights of the Golden Circle.

—The Bellfountaine (O.) Republican in speaking of Bro. Stoddard's lectures in that town and Bellecenter, highly compliments the audience and the speaker.

—Pres. Finney, on signing the call for the Mansfield meeting, said he would be willing to sigh it ten times if it were the last act of his life.

—The readers of the Cynosure will deeply sympathize with Rev. I. A.

Hart in the recent loss of his eldest daughter, Mrs. Eliza F. Phillips, at Llano, Texas. Mrs. Phillips graduated at Wheaton in 1869, and spent several years in teaching the freedmen in Mississippi and in the public schools of Texas. She was known and loved by a wide circle of friends, who sincerely mourn the early close of a life promising much fruit for the Father's glory. Of an unusually blameless and cheerful disposition, her hope in Christ shone clear and strong through the short and painful illness that closed her life, and was marked by all her attendants. The affliction is more severely felt by Bro. Hart and wife from her death and burial in a remote State.

—S. D. Greene, author of the Broken Seal, has been investigating the case of Chief Justice Waite of the Supreme Court as to any Masonic proclivities, and all will thank him for his successful effort which he thus reports: "Judge Waite is not a Mason, and his father was an Anti-mason, and as Judge he sometimes had witnessed cases that were tried and directed entirely contrary to evidence and his unexpectation. This I have from Judge Morley, judge of probate, who lived directly opposite Judge Waite the elder for years."

—The Advance correspondence from Brazil says the leading spirit of the Masonic war is Saldanha Marinha, a prominent politician, leader of the Republican party, and master of an influential Masonic lodge. He is attacking the Romish church through the press with great persistency and bitterness. The Brazilian papers do not print articles unless the writers pay for their insertion. The Masons foot the bills and keep their man at work. Thus the war against Romanism in Brazil develops into a sort of dog fight to see which party will get the bone.

—The Dayton Journal throws dirt at the meeting at Mansfield, O., to be held on the 17th inst., in this fashion: "One would imagine that there are enough open and avowed evils in the world to exercise the most active human philanthropy without groping about in the dark for possibilities. Most of the leaders of this movement have secret church officers meetings. Why not proceed against them?" Which proves that editors are not always well informed theoretically as well as experimentally on church matters, nor even on subjects of common fame.

—The Temperance Blessing, a Philadelphia journal purporting to oppose intemperance does it by giving a page to a lodge directory, headed with an illustration of the great Masonic pagoda lately erected in the Quaker City. The roster includes seventy Masonic bodies, some 150 Odd-fellow lodges, with Red Men, Knights of Pythias, Good-fellows, Good Samaritans and Daughters of Samaria, United American Mechanics, TrueTemplars, Good Templars, Temple of Honor and Temperance, Sons of Temperance, Daughters of Temperance, and Cadets of Temperance, the whole nearly filling six fair-sized columns. This way of banishing intemperance by an intemperate zeal for secret orders will never prove a great success.

—Grand Master Battin, of Ohio, has allowed the following desperate bit of pettifoggery to be published from one of his speeches:

"There is an erronious impression widely prevailing, that the order of Free and Accepted Masons is a secret society. You will perhaps be surprised when I tell you that it is not. Its times and places of meeting are well known to the public. The Constitution of its Grand and subordinate lodges are published and spread broadcast. Its principles, aims and purposes may be known and read by all men. The boys upon your streets can tell who are our members and who are not, and who hold office in the lodge and who do not. We install our officers, consecrate and dedicate our lodges in public. Were it a secret society all these things would be concealed. All societies of every kind and character wherever situated, whether civil, political or religious, transact their private business in secret."

—The Brooklyn Daily Times of the 22d ult. informs the public of a deplorable case of the lodge domineering over St. Paul's Evangelical Lutheran church in that city. The rule of the denomination is squarely against admitting to its communion members of any secret society. The pastor had admonished a Mr. Wreden, a member, for his connection with the Freemasons, and was assured that his instructions would be willingly heard in regard to the doctrines of the church. But in a few days Wreden complained to the church officers of the pastor's counsel, who resolved that no questions should be asked about lodge connection. To this the pastor protested as against Scripture, conscience, his ministerial vow and the rule of the church, before the congregation, but was outvoted by the crowd, many of whom were not entitled to the privilege of the ballot. It appears that many of the members are Masons and Odd-fellows and were highly indignant at their pastor, one Kohlmyer even threatening him with a beating if he did not keep quiet. This difficulty should serve as a danger signal to the testifying churches which, as may be seen elewhere, are already entering on a course beset with troubles enough to engulf any church.

Free Tracts.

KIND SIR:—We are trying to get tracts (hundreds of thousands), read by nearly every young man of our nation; for such men must be shown the traitorous workings of the five thousand secret dens, and learn to detest them, or we are doomed; and even now are drifting to either anarchy or to a monarchy.

Now that you are a worker in the Lord's vineyard, I invite you and your friends, to help us by handing papers out, singly, at the doors of your meetings, or in any suitable way, to intelligent men of 18 to 30 years. Write me and I will mail parcels to you for distribution; and also to such other working friends, in any of the States, as you may name to me; provided they dare strike a blow for Christ and his laws, even while rum and pipe, Ku-Klux and Masonry, all stand brandishing their swords in defense of their idols, and popular opinion still saying, "So mote it be."

We owe this service to Christ, to our youth, and to our country. Think of the loyal millions now shuddering under dire vengeance of murdering lynch-law, (an excrescence of Masonry) and then act as conscience dictates.

I send all these tracts perfectly free, believing that I am thus doing God's service. We want them read by the 5,000,000 young men of our nation; not one of whom, if honest, will ever after join a lodge. I think the "craft" will then—and for the same reason—become as harmless as did Jeff. Davis' army when he could get no more recruits. Address,

ENOCH HONEYWELL,
Altay, Schuyler Co., N. Y.

Mr. Honeywell adds: "Are not our heroic lecturers much of the time without free tracts to lay before our grown boys? . . . I wish to mail tracts to them without money or price."

TAKE NOTICE—FROM THE GENERAL AGENT.

Ohio Convention.

I have sent from this office nearly fifteen hundred copies of the call for convention at Mansfield on the 17th and 18th inst. Friends receiving them will please secure an insertion in local papers where practicable. Also ask your minister to give notice of the meeting on the Sabbath, and where you fail in this give notice yourself in the prayer or class-meeting. Let there be general united effort and a grand rally of the friends throughout the State. "They that be with us," in favor of a republican state and King Jesus, "over all God blessed forever, are more than they that be with them" who swear allegiance to despotism and do homage to the Worshipful Master of the lodge. The "Captain of our salvation" is mightier than the "Most Puissant Sovereign Grand Commander" of the "Supreme Council," and is calling to his soldiers to show their faith by their works. Who will answer to the roll call at 2 o'clock on the 17th in Mansfield?

Iowa Convention.

So far as I have knowledge, no formal call for a State anti-secrecy convention in Iowa has been circulated, but numerous letters have been received from different parts of the State, indicating that the friends are ready for organization and action. After carefully considering the several proposals for place and time of holding the convention, and other pertinent questions, and consulting with friends here, it seems best that such a convention be held at Eldora, Hardin Co., on the 3d and 4th of March, commencing at two o'clock P. M., of the 23d. The time for preliminary work will be short, but if all interested take hold with a will, it may be accomplished thoroughly.

To secure that thoroughness of preparation which will contribute largely to the success of the meeting, I would suggest:

1st. That ministers of churches testifying against secret orders, preach on the subject on Sabbath, Feb. 21st, and appoint meetings for prayer and conference on Friday evening, the 26th, and that near the close of the prayer-meeting delegates be appointed to the State meeting, and that a special prayer be offered for God's blessing upon them in the work of the convention. Also that they be informed of the wishes of the meeting in reference to the employment of a State Agent for Iowa, and the amount which they are to pledge for the State work during the coming year.

2d. That the several local associations already formed meet and appoint delegates, giving them such instructions as to pledges for the State work, agent, etc., as they may deem wise.

3d. That you secure the insertion of a notice in as many local or other papers as practicable, and ask your minister to announce it from his pulpit on the Sabbath, and where this cannot be done, announce the meeting yourself in the prayer or class-meeting.

4th. Circulate a paper in your neighborhood and secure all the names of friends you can who wish to be enrolled in the anti-secrecy cause and bring or send them to the convention.

And 5th. Let every man and woman who is in favor of free speech, a republican state, and who believes that the church of Christ should not shelter and sustain the anti-Christ of the lodge, and who can consistently do so, report at the convention for earnest work, and let those who come, come praying. Conversing recently with a faithful and beloved pastor, who left a sick wife to fill an appointment five miles in the country, he remarked that he went feeling greatly depressed, but praying all the way; and God was pleased to open his mouth with great freedom and while he was himself greatly blessed he had reason to believe that deep and lasting impressions were made upon the minds of the young men in his audience.

Brethren and sisters, will you not, like this pastor, come to the convention praying that God will deeply impress the young men of Iowa with the wickedness of the lodge, and save them from this artful snare of the enemy of righteousness. J. P. STODDARD.

P. S.—Persons wishing subscription cards to obtain pledges for the work during the year, can obtain them by writing to the corresponding secretary of the National Association.

An exchange says that the Pope has sent a marble statue of the Virgin Mary to the Romish seminary at Macon, Ga. It is to be set up in the chapel of the institution, and the Pope in an official letter addresses the faithful with the following pledge: "To all the faithful who visit this image of the Divine Mother in said oratory, and who recite there the 'Hail, Mary!' three times, we grant one hundred days' indulgence. Moreover, to all those who with the same dispoeitions shall recite therein the Litany of the Blessed Virgin (Loretto), we grant an indulgence of three hundred days. The aforesaid indulgences may be applied by way of suffrage to the suffering souls in purgatory."

The Home Circle.

We Reap What We Sow.

For pleasure or pain, for weal or for woe,
'Tis the law of our being—we reap as we sow;
We may try to evade them, may do what we will,
But our acts, like our shadows, will follow us still.

The world is a wonderful chemist, be sure,
And detects in a moment the base or the pure;
We may boast of our claims to genius or birth,
But the world takes a man for just what he is worth.

We start in the race for fortune or fame,
And then when we fail, the world bears the blame;
And nine times out of ten, 'tis plain to be seen,
There's a "screw somewhere loose" in the human machine.

Are you wearied and worn in this hard earthly strife?
Do you yearn for affection to sweeten your life?
Remember this great truth has often been proved,
We must make ourselves lovable, would we be loved.

Though life may appear a desolate track,
Yet the bread we cast on the water comes back.
This law was enacted by Heaven above—
That like begets like, and love begets love.

We are proud of our mansions of mortar and stone;
In our garden are flowers from every zone;
But the beautiful graces which blossom within Grow shriveled and die in the Upas of sin.

We make ourselves heroes and martyrs for gold,
'Till health becomes broken and youth becomes old.
Ah! did we the same for a beautiful love,
Our lives might be music for angels above.

We reap what we sow—oh wonderful truth!—
A truth hard to learn in the days of our youth;
But it shines out at last, as the "hand on the wall,"
For the world has its "debit" and "credit" for all.

—Selected.

Good Advice to Christians.

1. See that your religion makes you a better son or daughter, a better clerk, a better friend, a better workman. "By their fruits ye know them."

2. Do not set yourself up as a standard. Shun all censoriousness, especially toward old Christians, who may not look at things just as you do. Remember that each one "to his own Master standeth or falleth," and not to you.

3. Let nothing keep you from the Saviour. Never be tempted to stray away from him by unbelieving doubts, by past neglects, by present fear, by anything. Remember the faithful saying, "Christ came into the world to save sinners." Be more intimate with him than any earthly friend.

4. Never rejoice in your own strength. Resolutions are of no avail simply as such. A child looking to Christ is stronger than a strong man armed. Be resolute in looking to him alone for strength. This is all the resolution you need to make—for "Without me ye can do nothing."

5. Let this be the settled conviction of your soul, for without this all else is unavailing, all efforts to grow in grace will be as useless as to build a house upon the shifting sands.

Finally. Do not be discouraged if you fail in everything. If you were perfect, what need would you have of a Saviour? "Ask and it shall be given unto you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you. For every one that asketh receiveth," and so forth. "If ye then being evil, know how to give gifts to your children, how much more shall your heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him?"

The Public School.

The duty of the parent to visit the school where his children spend five or six hours every day has often been urged in this column. The responsibility which rests upon the parent with respect to the education of his child cannot be wholly delegated to another. The teacher is but the parent's assistant in the great work of educating—calling forth the powers of the child—and to insure the highest results, co-operation between the two agents concerned is absolutely indispensable. If the father cannot spare time from his business, the mother should see from her own observation what air her children breathe in school, what companions surround them, what influences, secret and open, are acting upon them. Any woman who can organize and carry on her household industries in a normal and systematic manner can form a very good idea as to the abilities and power of the teacher under whose tuition her child is placed. She can tell whether order, cleanliness, quiet and system pervade the school-room, though she may have forgotten every rule of grammar, all the complexities of fractions and be unable to bound correctly any State in the Union. The mere knowing enough to take scholars through the ordinary English branches is a very small part of the qualifications of any teacher. As to his power to organize, to marshal and to exercise leadership over his pupils, any woman who is mistress of her household in reality as well as in name is a pretty good judge. So long as the schools in our rural districts are given over to trustees, school committees and teachers, they will fail of a large part of the good they might accomplish if parents would but take a constant and active interest in promoting their usefulness. When a teacher feels that he has the hearty co-operation of intelligent parents, he enjoys at the same time both stimulus and reward. The scholars, too, take pride in showing to visitors the progress they are making and the excellence with which they can deport themselves and recite their lessons. This showing is best when made two or three times every week instead of in one grand exhibition at the close of the term.

Cheap school teachers like cheap clothes, cheap flour, cheap medicine are very expensive. Better far a good teacher for three months at $50 a month than a poor one for six months at $25 a month. You may put the most expensive broadcloths into the hands of an inexperienced tailor and he will make a far less attractive garment of it than cloth of half the price made up with the art of a master tailor. We want no bunglers to work at the minds of our children. The country is full of normal schools, and he or she who aspires to the high office of teacher should first learn how to teach.

Not long ago, passing a day in a quiet, rural neighborhood we visited for an hour or two the public school. There were about 30 scholars in the room, 25 of whom could read only in words of from two to five letters. The grammar class was called up, and the questions were asked and answered in the most uninteresting and mechanical way. Meantime the rest of the pupils were studying out loud or gazing round listlessly, whispering, moving about, and tossing up their books. When that class was through the teacher called up, one at a time, the little "primaries," and heard each read and spell separately in a tone we could not catch, the hubbub of the children continuing unabated. About every three minutes some one pupil asked permission to leave the room, and it was granted. Thus passed an hour and a half, when school was dismissed, and we had a little talk with the teacher. Of the three trustees, he told us, only one ever visits the school, no parent deigns to come in; all the scholars hadn't come in, so he had not been able to organize it. When cold weather comes there will be about thirty more, and an assistant. Meantime the school routine will move on as it did while we were there. No comments are necessary. We commend to every parent the picture we have drawn, and suggest that he or she, ought to know by personal inspection that it does not portray the school in his neighborhood. N. Y. Tribune.

The Druids of Ireland.

Among the mysteries which darkly loom out of the antiquity of ancient Ireland, the origin and office of the Druids are most mysterious. Yet the mention of pre-Christian Ireland at once suggests the mystic figure of the Druids veiled in the shadows of a thousand dim traditions, and surrounded by the lurid light of legends born of the awe and superstitious fancies of the past. Not only in Ireland, but in Celtic Britain and Gaul, was the Druid a prominent feature of society. Sixty years after the birth of our Saviour the Roman Pliny speaks of the Druids of Britain as famous among their brethren for their skill in the arts of magic and the darker sorts of scientific wisdom. He could not speak of the Druids of Ireland for the simple reason that neither Roman conquest nor, to any considerable degree, Roman knowledge extended to this country. The British Druids, we are told, had their principal seat in the island of Anglesea, and spent their time chiefly in the cultivation and exercise of their magical arts. Whence came the beginning of their knowledge no one knows. Some say it was founded on half-forgotten fragments of the doctrines of the Greek Pythagoras; others that it had an origin more ancient, and arose with the wise men of the distant and fabulous East. Whatever may have been the origin of their doctrines and rites, when they first appeared to us we find them famous for their learning and magic, and exercising an extremely powerful influence on people among whom they dwelt. With a reverence for nature which has become one of their traditional characteristics, they considered it unlawful, in the celebration of their rites, to shut out from the view of the worshiper the works of the Deity whom he worshiped by the use of temples "made with hands." The oak was especially sacred in their eyes, and under its shadow they performed their mysteries and paid their gloomy tribute of adoration to the "unknown God." This tree they regarded in its beauty, its strength, and its magnificent manifestation of the prolific power of nature, as a symbol of Deity. For the mistletoe they had also a particular regard. One of their most solemn ceremonies was that of cutting it down from the oak around which it clung.

The oak was regarded as the favorite tree of the divinity Tutanes, who appears to have been the same as the Phœnician god Baal, or the sun, worshiped under so many different names by the various pagan nations of antiquity. When the period of winter solstice arrived, the ancients, accompanied by their priests, the Druids, sallied forth with great pomp and rejoicings to gather the mistletoe which grew upon its trunk and wide-spead branches, which, in addition to the religious reverence with which it was regarded, was believed to possess great curative powers. When the oak was reached on which the mistletoe grew, two white bulls were bound to the tree, and the chief Druid, clothed in white (the emblem of purity), ascended, and, with a golden knife, cut the sacred plant, which was caught by another priest in the folds of his robe. The bulls were then sacrificed, and various festivities followed. The mistletoe thus gathered was divided into small portions and distributed among the people, who hung up the sprays over the entrances to their dwellings, as a propitiation and shelter to the sylvan deities during the season of frost and cold. These rites in connection with the mistletoe were retained throughout the Roman dominion in Britain and Ireland, and also for a long period under the sovereignty of the Jutes, Saxons, and Angles.

Among the Irish Druids the "sepulchral yew" was the most sacred of trees. They had a particular regard for the oak, but they reverenced the yew. Its somber and self-contained aspect seemed fittingly to mark it as the emblem of a deity who to them was a being of insolation and gloom. The mountain ash or roan-tree was also esteemed sacred, and was used in many of their ceremonies. Among these was a trial by ordeal. In order to test the innocence of an accused women (this particular kind of ordeal appears to have been confined to woman), she was obliged to lick an adz of bronze which had been heated in a fire made of roan tree or blackthorn. It is unnecessary to say that the superstition in favor of blackthorn still survives, though it may not be so generally known that the roan-tree is still the object of a regard more reverential. In some parts of Ireland it is the custom for cautious housewives to encircle their churns with branches of the plant, as a protection against the malignancy of witch and fairy, and for the purpose of helping the quantity and quality of their butter.

"Of the religious belief of the Druids," says a recent writer, "we have no distinct knowledge. We know from the places selected by them for the celebration of their rites, and from their adoption as sacred emblems of certain trees and plants, that their regard for the manifestations of nature must have taken in some sort the form of worship, whether of nature itself or of something beyond it; and we know that this something they endeavored to propitiate by sacrifices, some say by the sacrifice of human beings. Of this, however, as far at least as regards the Irish Druids, there is no particle of evidence. That they did sacrifice, however, is certain. The, Crommlechs or Druid's altars, so frequent throughout the country, are evidence of this."

There was poetry as well as mystery in the doctrines of the Druids. They appreciate the bright as well as the dark side of things; and the very gloominess of their rites would seem to indicate their reverence for a deity who to them was veiled in darkness.

Fire was an element which would seem to have been held especially sacred by the Druids. Of the reason of this we are not absolutely certain. It may have been because it was originally drawn from the sun, the husband, so to speak, of productive nature, and the most glorious representative of the Diety, who was the author of all things. It is stated, but it seems incorrectly, that the ancient Irish, like the Persians, were sun-worshipers.

Among their other qualifications, the Druids professed to have the gift of prophecy. A story is told of King Dathi, the last pagan monarch of Ireland, bearing a singular resemblance to one related by Shakespeare of Macbeth. Entering the royal chamber one morning, a Druid saluted Dathi as king of Alba (Scotland) "I am not the king of Alba," said the king; "why call me so?" "But you shall be," said the Druid; you will invade the country and take possession of it, and not only will you be king of Alba, but of Britain and Gaul." Conquest being thus so confidently suggested. the king arose and consulted his counsellors, telling them what the Druid had said. An expedition was at once set on foot for the invasion of the countries named, which, we are informed, he overran and conquered; but, in the height of his triumph, he was killed by lightning at the foot of the Alps. How like the story of Macbeth and the witches, who at first had hailed him as "king that shall be," but against whom afterwards he had such good reason to exclaim:

"Those juggling friends—
That palter us in a double sense
That keep the world of promise to our ear,
And break it to our hope."

The Druids did not immediately disappear with the introduction of Christianity. Mention of them is made as existing in isolated parts of the country long after St. Columbkill, who flourished in the latter part of the sixth century. To this day they have left, in a thousand popular practices and superstitions, traces of their power. Closely identified with the pre-Christian part of Ireland, they are yet so intangible to the eye of the historian that they appear little more than the outlines of grave and solemn figures—half veiled in mystery and gloom—and almost as awful to the vague conceptions of our imagination as the shadowy apparitions seen by the affrighted peasant on the German mountains.—Forney's Press.

Care for Your Investments.

Somebody, who has had his eyes open, makes these timely hints:

If you invest money in tools, and then leave them exposed to the weather, it is the same as loaning money to a spendthrift without security,—a dead loss in both cases.

If you invest money in books, and never read them, it is the same as putting your money into a bank but never drawing either principal or interest.

If you invest money in fine stock, and do not feed and protect them and properly care for them, it is the same as dressing your wife in silk to do kitchen work.

If you invest your money in choice fruits, and do not guard and give them a chance to grow and prove their value, it is the same as putting a good hand into the field with poor tools to work with.

If you invest your money in a good farm, and do not cultivate it well, it is the same as marrying a good wife and so abusing and enslaving her as to crush her energies and break her heart.

If you invest your money in a fine house, and do not cultivate your mind and taste so as to adorn it with intelligence and refinement, it is as if you was to wear broadcloth and a silk hat to the mill.

If you invest your money in fine clothes, and do not wear them with dignity and ease, it is as if a plowman were to sit at a jeweler's table to make and adjust hair springs.

If you invest money in strong drink, it is the same as turning hungry hogs into a corn-field,—ruin will follow in both cases.

If you invest your money in every new wonder that flaming circulars proclaim, it is the same as buying tickets at a lottery office, where there are ten blanks to one prize.

If you invest your money in the last novel, it is the same as employing a tailor's dandy to dig potatoes.

—Let those be thy choicest companions who have made Christ their chief companion.

Avoid Little Things.—The avoidance of little evils, little sins, little inconsistencies, little weaknesses, little follies, little indulgences of self and of the flesh, little acts of indolence, of indecision, of slovenliness or cowardice, little equivocations or aberrations from high integrity, little bits of worldliness and gayety, little indifferences to the feelings and wishes of others, little outbreaks of temper and crossness, or selfishness, or vanity—the avoidance of such little things as these go far to make up at least the negative beauty of a holy life.

Children's Corner.

The Queen at The Paper Mill.

The Queen was riding out in her grand carriage, the horses tossing their plumes as if they felt themselves a little better than common horses, and the footman all decked out in red, feeling that they had something royal about them. The Queen had always had everything she wanted, and so was quite miserable because she could not think of a want to supply, or a new place to visit.

At last she bethought her that they had just been building a new paper mill, a few miles out of the city, Now she had never seen a paper mill, and so she determined to stop a little way off, there leave her carriage, and walk in—not as a Queen, but as an unknown, common lady. She went in alone, and told the owner she would like to see his mill. He was in a great hurry, and did not know that she was the Queen. But he said to himself: "I can gratify the curiosity of this lady, and add to her knowledge; and, though I am terribly hurried, yet I will do this kindness." He then showed her all the machinery, how they bleach the rags and made them white; how they grind them into pulp; how they make sheets and smooth them, and dry them, and make them beautiful. The Queen was astonished and delighted. She would now have something new to think about and talk about.

Just as she was about leaving the mill, she came to a room filled with old worn-out, dirty rags. At the door of this room was a great multitude of poor, dirty men and women and children, bringing old bags on their backs, filled with bits of rags, and paper, parts of old newspapers, and the like, all exceedingly filthy. These were rag-pickers, who had picked these old rags out of the streets and gutters of the great city.

"What do you do with all these vile things?" said the Queen.

"Why, madam, I make paper out of them. To be sure they are not very profitable stock, but I can use them, and it keeps those poor creatures in bread."

"But these rags! Why sir, they are of all colors, and how do you make them white?"

'O! I have the power of taking out all the dirt and all colors. You see the 'scarlet' and 'crimson,' yet I can make even scarlet and crimson, the hardest colors to remove, become white as snow."

"Wonderful! wonderful!" said the Queen. She took her leave, but the polite owner of the mill insisted on walking and seeing her safe in her carriage. When she got in and bowed to him with a smile, and he saw all the grand establishment, he knew it was the Queen.

"Well, well!" said he, "she has learned something at any rate. I wish it might be a lesson in true religion."

A few weeks after, the Queen found lying upon her writing desk a pile of the most beautiful polished paper she had ever seen. On each sheet were the letters of her own name, and her own likeness. How she did admire it! She found also, a note within, which she read. It ran thus:

"Will my Queen be pleased to accept a specimen of my paper, with the assurance that every sheet was manufactured out of the contents of those dirty bags which she saw on the backs of the poor rag-pickers? All the filth and colors are washed out, and I trust the result is such as even a Queen may admire. Will the Queen also allow me to say, that I have had many a good sermon preached to me in my mill? I can understand how our Lord Jesus Christ can take the poor heathen, the low, sinful creatures everywhere, viler than the rags, and wash them and make them clean; and how, 'though their sins be as scarlet, he can make them whiter than snow; and though they be red, like crimson, he can make them as wool.' And I can see that he can write his own name upon their foreheads, as the Queen will find her name upon each sheet of paper; and I can see how, as these filthy rags may go into the palace and ever be admired, some poor, vile sinners may be washed in the blood of the Lamb, and be received into the palace of the Great King in heaven."—Rev. John Todd.

Battle of the Bull-frogs.

Many of the citizens of Vermont will remember to have seen on one-dollar bills of the Windham County State Bank a vignette representing bull-frog fighting. This was engraved to commemorate the Battle of Bull-frogs. The facts were as follows: "Many years ago, when the town of Windham was newly settled, there came a very dry season. There are two large ponds in Windham, separated by an intervening strip of land considerable in extent. Each of these ponds was inhabited by a large community of the reptiles above named. The smaller pond dried up, and its inhabitants, started in a body for the lower and larger. They were met in the intervening space by the community from the larger pond, and a fierce and long contested battle ensued between the rival communities. Such was the hideous bellowing of the frogs during their fierce encounter that it alarmed the inhabitants who at first supposed it to be the whoop of the hostile savages. But curiosity getting the better of their fears, they cautiously proceeded to the spot whence the hideous sound issued, and there beheld the strange spectacle of two immense armies of bull frogs, covering many acres of ground, engaged in a fierce and deadly battle. This battle continued more than twenty-four hours, and when it was over the ground was literally covered with the slain, and it became necessary, to avoid the noxious effluvia, to gather and bury them."—Boston Transcript.

Religious Intelligence.

—In Philadelphia the Episcopalians have 79 churches and 18,125 church members; the Methodists, 75 churches and 19,770 members; the Presbyterians, 72 churches, 22,035 members; the Baptists, 51 churches and 16,507 members.

—The Almanac of the Protestant Episcopal church for 1875 gives the average percentage of the church's increase in members during the past year. In the diocese this has been 5.93 per cent, in the missionary jurisdictions 13.14 per cent.

—The Young Men's Christian Association of New York recently held its twenty-second anniversary. Vice-president Wilson presided and Rev. J. F. Elder conducted the devotional exercises. At the Bowery branch association 166,000 meals, nearly half of them free, have been dispensed during the year. In the central building religious meetings, to the number of 1,003, have been held; of these, 555 have been for young men only. The Young Men's Bible Class, conducted by Dr. Thompson in Association Hall, has had 31 sessions during the year, with an average attendance of 952. The smallest attendance was 350, and the largest, 1,300.

—At least 1,500 native women, principally of the middle class, in and around Calcutta, India, are being educated at their own homes, each paying on an average a rupee a month for Bengalee, and two rupees for English instruction. The expense is met by a Government grant. It is estimated that for the past ten years 2,500 women have been constantly under instructions at their own homes in that part of India.

—The United Presbyterian congregation at Sparta, Ill., under the pastoral care of W. J. Gillespie adopted the free seat system some time since. About $2,200 were raised during the past year in a church of some 300 members.

—The First United Presbyterian Church of Monmouth, Ill., has been enjoying a gracious revival. Fifty-four members have been received since the General Assembly last summer.

—James Lenox, the philanthropist of New York, who, it is said, gives away yearly $100,000, is a Presbyterian, and an elder in the Fifth Avenue Church of that city. He is a plain, "old-fashioned" man, and because he does not approve of the use of the organ, the church is deficient in this instrument.

—The Religious Telescope has reports from some forty United Brethren churches throughout the country where revivals are progressing. In some places the work of grace is of great power and scores are seeking Christ.

—Bro. I. Brown, a graduate of Wheaton in 1872, and afterwards agent of Westfield College, now in the Senior class in thelogy at Oberlin, has been preaching at West Mill Grove near Toledo, O., with great acceptance during his winter vacation.

—Dea. West, of Allegan, Mich., has put up and enclosed as a gift to the Congregational church a parsonage at a cost of $1,000.

—Pastor J. S. Hoyt of Port Huron Congregational church, Mich., gave his note last July for $14,000 to save Olivet College. He has faith that he will raise the full amount from the Christian people of the State; and undertakes the work at his own charges. There are other good causes which need just such men.

—Rev. W. F. Manley, chairman of the Jacksonville (Ill.) district of the Free Methodist church, reports to the Free Methodist two churches in course of erection in his field, and is ruinously abridging his personal resources to accomplish the work. He rendered Bro. Hinman, Ill. State Agent, great assistance during the meetings in his vicinity.

—Miss Chase writes to the Missionary Link, from Calcutta, that there are not not less than twenty missionaries and native helpers preaching every morning and evening in the different bazars of that heathen city.

—The Yoke-fellows is the name taken by some 500 young men in this city, who, while employed in business, still give some time each week to definite Christian work. The first band was formed some four years since, in the Y. M. C. A. by Mr. Moody and numbers nearly 100 members. Other bands are scattered among the churches and Sabbath-schools. Their plan of work is to meet each Sabbath evening, after which they read the Scriptures, sing, speak, and pray, then go out upon the street corners, armed with printed invitations to church, to bring in young men, especially strangers in the city, lingering about the doorways, of the Hall, and at the second meeting they find many to converse with.

News of the Week.

Congressional.

Mr. Morton, of Indiana, presented last week the memorial signed by the officers of the Women's National Temperance Union and 100,000 other persons against the manufacture, importation of alcoholic liquors as a beverage in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on Finance. Similar petitions were presented by Messrs. Morrill, of Maine; Hamilton, of Maryland, and Boutwell, of Massachusetts, and were referred to the same committee.

—The Civil Rights bill passed the House under the new rule excluding the desperate parliamentary tricks used by the minority to put off legislation. The vote stood 162 to 100. The bill is modified as it came from the Senate by striking out the clauses relating to cemeteries and public schools, which were stricken out and the adoption of the equal rights plank of the Democratic platform of 1872 as a preamble. Nearly two weeks have been spent on this bill through the filibustering of the Democrats.

—Ex-Governor and Senator Wm. A. Buckingham, died at his home in Norwich, Conn., Feb. 5th.——Carpenter has been defeated in Wisconsin and Angus Cameron elected to fill his place in the U. S. Senate.

General.

—The storm of last week was one of the most severe for years in northern Iowa and Illinois, and parts of Wisconsin, Nebraska, and Kansas. The wind was a fierce gale, the cold intense, and in many sections a heavy snow just fallen whirled into deep drifts. All the railroads of Wis., Minn., and northern Iowa were blockaded. The suffering on the western prairies must have been fearful. It is stated that twenty persons were frozen to death in Kansas in January; many more it is feared perished last week.——Taylor Hall, the largest building of Racine College was burned last week.——Tilton was admitted as witness in the Brooklyn trial, and last week was occupied in hearing his revolting story.

—Prominent colored men in council in Washington lately have published over the signatures of Frederick Douglass, John M. Langston, A. M. Gibbs, Phillip Joseph, and George W. Price. a document setting forth the lawlessness in the Southern States, heartily endorsing the several messages of the President touching the murderous proceedings now in progress in several States in the South, and thanking the Republicans in Congress for the efforts made to support revolution and secure life and property in disturbed districts. If Congress declines to extend civil rights to colored citizens, they will be driven into neutrality between parties, into joining the Democrats for self-protection, or into adopting a fearful policy of retaliation and revenge.——Allen Green testified before the Louisiana Investigating Committee lately, that an election-day fight in which he was concerned was the result of a family feud only. Mr. de Lahousie testified of the terrorism exercised by the White League in St. Martin Parish, and Lieut. Cook gave the result of his observations in Martinsville, the people of which regarded United States troops as so many tools of the Kellogg Government. J. J. Johnson, a State legislator, gave evidence in regard to a large number of murders which had taken place in the State.——A daring express robbery is reported from Memphis. The scheme was deeply laid, and the thieves succeeded in obtaining a pouch containing a large number of money packages. Brady, an express man, was delivering a parcel addressed to W. R. Parker & Co., a newly established firm, when the persons in charge of the place—two white men and three negroes—threw a rope around his neck and a bag over his head, and beat him to a state of almost insensbility. The thieves decamped after locking their victim up on the premises.

Foreign.

—The French National Assembly has voted down a proposition providing that the future Government of that country should consist of a Senate, a Chamber of Deputies and a President of the Republic. This is deemed a blow to the Republic.——The Emperor of China aged nineteen years, died on the 12th of January. His son aged five years, is said to be his natural successor. The Chinese are not generally regarded as being a very enterprising nation, but its late ruler may certainly be said to have matured and died young. The population of China is from 300,000,000 to 500,000,000 people. And yet the disease of this important monarch is announced a fortnight after its occurrence in a brief telegraphic dispatch.——The German Federal Council has empowered Prince Bismarck to conclude an extradition treaty with the United States.——On the 3d inst., an avalanche of snow fell from Cape Diamond near Quebec burying a house and its six inmates who perished.——It is reported that the Pope has written to Don Carlos, expressing his sympathy, but advising him to reconsider his determination to continne the war, as the dignity of the Catholic church has been vindicated and the rights of the clergy recognized by King Alphonso. Carlos does not, however, seem inclined to yield his advantage, and severe fighting is reported as imminent.

Farm and Garden.

How to Break a Colt.—In breaking a colt it is necessary to teach him to stop at the word whoa. Not only should one and the same word be used, but one and the same tone. The colt that has been broken to stop at the firm low tone of command, is not likely to stop at the word uttered in a high key. When a man halloos, "whoo-oo-o" in a wild tone of affright that would make the hair raise on the head of a marble statue, and that sends the women of the neighborhood to their doors shrieking "what's the matter," a colt is very apt to feel nervous. When a man snarls, "whoa sir-r-r-r-sir," through his teeth, as if he would say, "stand still, you brute, or I'll tear your heart out," the cry counteracts, not only the effect of early training, but of those powerful opiates, old age and starvation, and even the poorest old crowbait is ready to repeat the runaway scrapes of his early youth. The imploring tone "who-oh, who-oh," ending with a note of despair. "Do stand still, I know you won't. Oh! I shall be killed!" might as well be addressed to a railroad corporation as a horse. The loving tone "Who-ee, who-ee sweet 'ittle bonny horsee; doee stand still, that's a darling," is wasted unless one has oats, salt or sugar, which are never on hand in a pinch when wanted. The shrill feminine cry, "Whaw! whaw!" like the squawk of a hen caught by the leg, invariably screamed by the inexperienced female when a driving-rein or hold-back breaks, is alarming in the extreme to a high tempered animal. A tone of fear or rage imparts fear to the horse. To govern one well a man must have mastery over himself. No matter what the emergency, nor how much there is to excite fear and anger, the tone employed must be that of one fully master of the situation, not only free from passion himself, but at liberty to soothe the fears of his trembling dependent. The tone, in short, must be that of a king—firm, as of one that does not contemplate disobedience; gentle, but conveying a sense of absolute power.—Iowa Homestead.

Care of Implements.—Every farmer should keep a good wrench which can be adjusted to fit a nut of any size, that may be employed on wagons or farm implements. The wood work of implements and carriages frequently shrinks so that clips, bolts and braces have an opportunity to work; if the nuts are not tightened, the parts commence wearing or the nuts soon work off the bolts. The same is true of rivets, when they pass through wood work. They often need to be drawn up tight with a riveting hammer.

Home and Health Hints.

Parlor Furniture.—The usual furniture of a parlor in the city is a sofa, half-a-dozen stuffed chairs, an easy-chair or two, a center-table, a card-table, a handsome carpet, curtains, bracket and hanging lamps, with pictures, brackets, vaces according to the taste and means of the owner. Carpets are of every style and price, so of curtains, so of cabinet furniture. Subscriber must find out how much he can spend on his parlor, and then he can decide what to buy and at what price. We would advise carpet and curtains of good quality, with a half-dozen chairs and a rocking-chair, the other articles to be added by and by, rather than to buy everything at once and ofpoor quality. If subscriber is going to housekeeping for the first time, we suggest that he purchase only indispensable articles at first, and add from time to time such as he may require and can afford. In this way the novelty of the situation lasts a long time. There is a deal of pleasure in climing up if one only know how.

Cooking Oatmeal.—Oatmeal is not usually liked because its preparation is not properly understood. A correspondent of the American Grocer gives the following mode:

Mix your oatmeal smooth in cold water, then pour into boiling water, adding a little salt to season. Keep this water at a boiling point for two hours, and just before it is thoroughly cooked add a little milk to thicken and improve the flavor. Stir thoroughly at intervals.

If you want to make oat cake, knead a cup of oatmeal, roll it out thin, and cut it in squares, then bake in an oven. To be served cold and buttered.

CLEANING BLANKETS.—The Boston Journal of Chemistry gives the following method of cleaning blankets: Put two large teaspoonfuls of borax and a pint bowl of soft soap into a tub of cold water. When dissolved, put in a pair of blankets and let them remain over night. Next day rub out and rinse thoroughly in two waters and hang them to dry. Do not ring them. But this is not the only domestic use to which borax may be put. Borax is the best cockroach-exterminator yet discovered. This insect has a peculiar aversion to it. As the salt is perfectly harmless to human beings, it must be preferred for this purpose to the poisonous substances generally used. Borax is valuable for the laundry; use one pound to about ten gallons of boiling water, and you need only about one-half the ordinary allowance of soap. For laces, cambrics, etc., use an extra quantity of this powder. It will not injure the texture of the cloth in the least. For cleansing the hair nothing is better than a solution of borax-water. Wash afterward with pure water, if it leaves the hair too stiff. Borax dissolved in water is an excellent dentifrice, or tooth-wash.

TO KEEP ONIONS.—The best way of keeping onions for family use is the old-fashioned one of stringing them. Gather them without breaking off the tops. Take up three or four and string through the tops, and tie a string around them to secure them firmly. Add more onions, and tie until you have a string a foot or more in length. Hang them in a dry place, and they will keep any length of time.

TO REMOVE STAINS FROM MATTRESSES.—Make a thick paste by wetting starch with cold water. Spread this on the stain, first putting the mattress in the sun. Rub this off after an hour or so, and if the ticking is not clean, try the process again.

Temperance.

At a large temperance meeting recently held in Chicago, President Moss said of all the monopolies which curse our beloved land, the liquor monopoly was the largest. The GROSS earnings of the five largest rail-roads in the United States for a year would not pay the workingmen's liquor bill for three months. Of all deplorable sights the most deplorable was to see half a dozen poor laborers sitting down in a saloon and discussing the hardness of the times and the tyranny of monopolies. He said churches ought to have pleasant, well-conducted libraries and reading-rooms open every day and evening of the week. That Christians should build commodious, tasteful churches, but not make them too good to use. That they should make it their business to see that active well-kept places were maintained for the refreshment of business men and travelers.

Dr. Nelson said that a common cause of apoplexy and Bright's disease of the kidneys was the use of alcoholic liquors; also that parents who used alcoholic beverages usually entailed weakness, mental, moral and physical on their children, imbecility and frequently early death.

Emory Storrs, Esq., said some Germans complained of the temperance people for interfering with their national customs. He said one of their national customs was to put every man into the army and keep him there seven years. But they did not care to have that custom observed here; that intelligent men should not urge the fact of a national custom as a reason for drinking beer, but argue the case candidly and settle the question on its intrinsic merits. Another gentleman said reformers were often complained of for meddling with other people's business, whereas they were only acting in self-defense against the fiery flying serpent which was seeking to intrude everywhere. The serpent in the garden of Eden was an intruder, and sin, usually disguised, had been meddling and interfering with the plans and happiness of men ever since.

Pres. Walker, of Wheaton, said that philanthropists attempting to reform inebriates while saloons were licensed to continue their murderous traffic, were like persons attempting to save half drowned men from a deep, swift current, while ruffians away up near the fountain head were continually throwing men into the stream?

DO WORKMEN NEED LIQUOR?—The change of the Great Western railway of Canada from "broad gauge" to the width of track commonly in use in this country, over two hundred miles of track, is one answer. The method is discribed by a correspondent:

"For this purpose they have had nearly 2,000 men at work almost night and day, and for the time being nearly all the traffic has been suspended. It was quite an interesting sight to see these men like busy bees, hard at work on some portions of the line. During the alterations the men are prohibited from having any beer, although some of them worked night and day, and others seventeen or eighteen hours per day, yet they declared they were better without the beer. Though the company put this restriction upon the men, yet they were not indifferent to their wants in this particular; they provided an abundance of oatmeal, sugar, and pure water, and for every gang of twenty men or so, one man was set apart to prepare this oat meal beverage, etc., which the men enjoyed, many of them testified that they preferred it to beer, and the company were satisfied that the work was done much better and sooner than it would have been if the usual allowance of beer had been given."

—Chas. J. Baker, of Troy, N. Y., recently brought a suit under the civil damage act against a saloon keeper of that city, in favor of a respectable lady whose husband had become inebriated by liquor drank at his saloon. The case was tried before a county justice, and a verdict of fifty dollars damages besides costs was awarded to the plaintiff. This is the first suit of the kind in that city.

MASONRY A WORK OF DARKNESS.

A SERMON BY

REV. LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG.

III. BECAUSE IT SUBVERTS JUSTICE; IS BASED ON IMPOSTURE; AND HAS BEEN RENDERED POPULAR ONLY BY SELF-EXALTATION.

IT SUBVERTS JUSTICE. The mystic power by which this is done, is in conformity to the following points of Masonic obligation:

"I promise and swear that I will obey all signs given, handed, sent, or thrown to me by the hand of a brother Mason." And,

"I promise and swear that I will aid and assist a companion Royal Arch Mason whenever I see him engaged in any difficulty, and espouse his cause so far as to extricate him from the same, if it be in my power, WHETHER HE BE RIGHT OR WRONG."

Strict adherence to these Masonic oaths is capable of producing immense mischief in the subversion of justice A masonic judge on the bench, receiving a sign from the hand of a culprit before him at the bar, is bound, by his Masonic oath, to espouse that culprit's cause, "RIGHT OR WRONG," and acquit him, if possible. A Masonic witness, seeing the same sign, is bound, by his Masonic oath, to favor the culprit's cause, "RIGHT OR WRONG," and testify that he knows nothing about the affair, or obstinately refuse to give testimony, though it cost him a fine of two hundred and fifty dollars, and three months imprisonment. A Masonic juryman, seeing the same sign is Masonically bound to bring in a verdict of NOT GUILTY, "RIGHT OR WRONG." A Masonic civil officer, seeing the same sign, and having charge of a brother, prisoner, is bound, by his Masonic oath, to give the culprit an opportunity to escape from justice, "RIGHT OR WRONG." A failure in any of these instances, would be a violation of Masonic obligations, and subject the offender to the execution of the penalty of death. Doubtless in the course of human affairs, many innocent persons have been condemned; the guilty acquitted; and the rights of the just, given to the unjust oppressor, through the influence of the mystic power of Masonry to subvert justice.

THE INSTITUTION OF FREEMASONRY IS BASED ON IMPOSTURE. Many of its most boasted claims are found to be a mere imposition on the world. It claims a divine origin, while the proof is plain before us, that it is a Work of Darkness. It claims antiquity in its present form, when it is evident that its antique form, if any such form existed, was merely a compound of Jewish ceremonies and heathen mysteries, while the history of Freemasonry clearly proves that the degrees of its present form are the result of modern invention. It claims a superior degree of the light of Science; but when its science is analyzed, it is found to be merely the SCIENCE of hoodwinking candidates, and teaching of BOAZ and JACHIN, SHIBBOLETH AND MAH HAH-BONE, and a variety of ceremonies too silly to occupy the time of children, and too wicked ever to be practiced by Christians.

Masonry claims to possess, in a high degree, the virtue of morality, such as charity, honesty, truth, and good-will to mankind. But, on investigation of its moral principles by the test of Truth, it proves to be a system of gross immorality. Its BENEVOLENCE is mere selfishness, confining fraternal charity to the fraternity only. Its HONESTY consists merely in being under oath not to defraud a brother Mason out of two-pence. Its TRUTH, when put to the test, is found to be an oath on penalty of death, to CONCEAL THE TRUTH, even unto perjury, for the preservation of Masonic secrets, and for the concealment of Masonic crimes, let the amount of fines and imprisonment be what it may. And its GOOD WILL TO MANKIND, is found to exist in an oath to execute secret vengeance on members of the human family, for offenses of the most trifling nature.

And, as the finishing stroke and topmost point of all its superlative arrogations, Masonry claims an indissoluble affinity to Christianity. It professedly combines the hope of the Christian and that of the Mason, to one common center. Its aim is to inspire the belief, that heaven itself is the superlative Grand Lodge of Perfection; that God is the Great Grand Master Mason of the Universe; that Christianity and Masonry united, will prepare mankind for the eternal celebrations of the upper Grand Lodge; and that all who are thus prepared, will be honored with the chief seats, and be entitled to wear the most precious Jewels of the heavenly Temple, where the never-ending employment will be to Labor with imperishable Masonic Implements, and participate in the sublime Refreshments of an eternal meeting in the "SANCTUM SANCTORUM." Such anticipations, doubtless, have made thousands of MASONIC CHRISTIANS; inspired them with hope, high as the throne of God; and filled them with expectations of future happiness, as expansive as the universe, while not a mallet was lifted, nor a stroke employed, nor a step taken, nor a prayer offered, nor a desire raised to the Throne of Mercy, for that purity of heart, that holiness of life, and that good hope through the grace of the Savior, which alone can secure the blessings of a glorious immortality.

But the light of Truth has disclosed the secret, that the Masonic claim of oneness with Christianity is altogether fallacious. No system can be correct which inculcates directly contrary principles. Masonry does this by a studied union with all kinds of religion. It perfectly accords with the religion of the Pagan, who worships the Apis and Crocodile in Egypt. It conforms to the religion of the Hindoo, who kneels before the household earthen images which are to be annually offered for sacrifice, in consecrated waters, to the gods of Neptune; or him who joins in the sacrifice of human victims on the funeral pile, or expiates for sin under the wheels of the temple of Juggernaut. Masonry perfectly accords with the religion of Mahomet, and holds the Alcoran in as high veneration as the Christian's Bible. And it equally harmonizes with the religion of the Infidel, who rejects the Bible as a fabrication of human invention; who denies the necessity of a Redeemer; who pours contempt on the doctrine of Christ crucified; who ridicules the Christian's fears and hopes, as the chimera of fanaticism, or the vision of a deluded imagination; and prides himself in the belief that reason, unassisted by Divine revelation, is the all-sufficient guide to happiness, both here and hereafter. As a proof that Freemasonry is equally partial to Infidelity, as to Christianity, you are presented at one view, with the emblems of each order, at every Masonic procession in the land of Christendom. The open Bible is carried as an emblem of the Christian's rule of life; while the Square and Compass, ON THE OPEN BIBLE, are displayed with equal pomp, as emblematical of the governing principles of reason, the only rule of life acknowledged by the Infidel. By this boasted union with various systems of religion, of directly contrary principles, Freemasonry proves itself to be Anti-Christian, a system of imposture, totally destitute of the doctrine of salvation, devoid of a platform of correct moral principles, and fit only to be classed with the Works of Darkness.

THE INSTITUTION OF FREEMASONRY HAS BEEN RENDERED POPULAR ONLY BY SELF-EXALTATION. No institution has been so highly extolled as Freemasonry. Its favorite orators have exerted their highest stretch of power to proclaim its praises to the wondering world. Ignorant of its real character, which was masked in disguise, the world could not dispute its claims, and consequently, its pathway to honor was unobstructed. Under such circumstances, it has been the policy of the Prince of Darkness te raise the popularity of the institution of Freemasonry, by enlisting the great, the learned, the nobles of the earth, to become members of the fraternity. While of the religion of the Lord Jesus, it has been said, "Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble are called;" of Masonry, it has been the boast of its panegyrists, that great men, mighty men, nobles, kings of the earth, chief captains of hosts, great lords and counsellors, honorable rulers, chief judges and magistrates, great merchants, rich men, great heroes, great philosophers, learned prelates, dignitaries, bishops, elders, and many members of Christian Churches, have honored the institution of Freemasonry with their membership. This has been the triumph of the institution, the theme of its orators, and the boast of all its powers of self-exaltation.

But the period has at last arrived, when the mask of Masonic disguise no longer obstructs the power of perception; and the wondering world is now able to understand the MANNER in which all these great, and mighty, and noble, and honorable, and learned men were made Masons. Every one of these great wonders of men, who in his kingly or pontifical attire, appears in a Masonic procession like an inhabitant of some other planet than the earth, whose tinseled and tinkling robe, with golden bells and pomegranates, and whose apparently celestial mitre, with "HOLINESS TO THE LORD," written in large capitals on the forehead, attracting the gaze even of THE CHILDREN AND SERVANTS OF THE STREETS; yes, reader, every such GREAT MAN, in order to become a great Mason, has submitted to be stripped of every article of wearing apparel, to the last article of decency, and that divested of pins and sleeve-buttons; and to be invested with the additional clothing of a pair of Masonic drawers, tied on with strings, reaching a little below the knees; an old slipper on one foot, and the other bare; a tight bandage round the head to cover the eyes, and constitute a poor blind candidate in search of Masonic light; and a rope called a cable-tow, about ten feet long, with one end noosed round his neck. Such is the mere preparation to enter a Lodge-room. How dignified must a great man, or a Minister of the Gospel appear, in this pitiful plight! And yet every great man, to become a Mason, has been thus prepared, in a little adjoining apartment, to enter a temple of Masonic science, totally ignorant of the matter, and form, and oath, and ceremony, which were there to be required of him. He saw nothing, he knew nothing, for he appeared to himself like a fool. But his friendly guide announced his readiness to go forward; and after a round of ceremonies, the door of the Lodge-room was opened, and he was permitted to enter. As he passed the threshold of the "SANCTUM SANCTORUM," to his sudden and great surprise, his left breast came in contact with the sharp point of the Compasses held and guided by a Masonic officer. At the same instant, he was, probably, almost shocked out of his wit, by the apparent thunder of a fraternal stamp on the floor with the foot, which every Mason in the room performed with his might. After traveling awhile round the room in darkness, he was directed to kneel on the floor, for the benefit of a prayer, which is usually a written form, without the name of Jesus in it. After further ceremonies, he was directed to kneel on his left knee, to place his left hand UNDER the Bible, and his right hand ON the open Book, Square, and Compasses, in which position he was required to take the oath of an Entered Apprentice, swearing to keep all the secrets of Masonry, on penalty of death. Amidst the roar of another fraternal stamp, the bandage from the eyes being suddenly removed, he was next brought to behold the AMAZING light of three burning candles, the almost dazzling brightness of which, he was instructed to understand, represented the Sun, Moon, and WORSHIPFUL Master of a Lodge. What most wonderful light! What sublime representations! Next, he was instructed to understand, that pressing his thumb nail hard upon the upper joint of the fore finger of a person with whom he shakes hands, is the grip, the sign, and the first token of a Mason and that its name is Bo-az, which name he was sworn never to reveal, on penalty of having his throat cut, and his tongue torn out by the roots. After a round of ceremonies of similar importance, to teach him the royal Masonic art of keeping a secret, and bestowing CHARITY ON WORTHY BROTHER MASONS, he was divested of his drawers and slipper, invested again with his own apparel, presented with a Masonic apron, taught how to tie it on and wear it, and he was Masonically pronounced an ENTERED APPRENTICE FREEMASON.

Such is the manner in which men enter the door leading to all honor and GREATNESS to which a multitude of Masonic Degrees, equal in folly, and far superior in wickedness, can raise a human being. And now the world must be excused for deciding that Freemasonry has been transported into popularity by self-exaltation without merit. For the light of Truth has discovered that all its accumulated greatness derived existence only from the profusion of its own praise. All its boast of wonder has proved to be the empty sound of the trumpet of self-exaltation. This alone has rendered Masonry popular in the world; and the public knowledge of this fact has tumbled the whole self-exalted fabric into the depths of degradation. It has become a proverb and a by-word, a reproach among mankind. For, among other abominations, the subversion of justice, its deception, pretensions, and its self-exalted nothingness, have engraved it on the list of the Works of Darkness, never to be obliterated.

If such is the nature of Speculative Freemasonry, then all lovers of God, lovers of mankind, and well-wishers to the best interests of community, are under special obligation to renounce it; to withdraw fellowship from all who adhere to it; to reprove it by precept and example; and, by every laudable effort, endeavor to exterminate its influence from the society of mankind. Such is the admonition of an inspired apostle: "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them." Particularly on a review of the foregoing subjects, it may be remarked,

1. THAT ALL MINISTERS OF THE GOSPEL, OF EVERY DENOMINATION, WHO ARE MASONS, AND ALL MASONIC MEMBERS OF CHRISTIAN CHURCHES, ARE COLLECTIVELY AND INDIVIDUALLY BOUND BY THE AUTHORITY OF GOD'S HOLY WORD, TO RENOUNCE FELLOWSHIP WITH FREEMASONRY.

They are under no less obligation to renounce fellowship with THIS WORK of darkness, and to reprove it, than they are to renounce, abstain from, and reprove Adultery, Intemperance, Profanity, Sabbath-breaking, Theft, Perjury, Murder, or any other work of darkness that can be named. Adherence to the principles of an institution, combined in its efforts to maintain opposition to God, can not consist with the maintenance of Christian character. As well may there be communion between the light and darkness; as well may there be concord between Christ and Belial; as well may he that believeth have part with an infidel, as for a professed minister of the Gospel, or any private Christian, to continue connection and fellowship with Freemasonry, and still maintain an unblemished Christian character, and an holy walk with God.

That the book is one of great interest and value is shown by the following

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issued by him, purporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationa ist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—'The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The anthor belonged to the same ledge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughout the country forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is supposed by many to be, in its obligations, the anthor of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acquainted with Mr. Greene, and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y., and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—'The Storm Gathering;' "Abdnction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

Publisher's Department.

The following reasons for publishing the Cynosure were given in the first issue of the paper. How strong they seem in the light of the present!

1. Each of all existing papers has a specialty of its own, and cannot attend properly to this [viz., opposition to secret societies.]

2. As the secret orders cannot endure free discussion they will not allow it where they can prevent it; and hence most existing papers are in danger of being damaged by them if they open their columns to a full and thorough discussion of these orders, such as is given to other subjects, and such as is demanded by their prevalence and importance.

3. Large and intelligent bodies of Christians, such as the United Presbyterians, United Brethren, Free and Wesleyan Methodists, etc., have always made membership in such orders a cause of discipline, and several State conventions and associations of Congregationalists have adopted stringent resolutions against them, while other national church organizations fraternize with and protect the secret orders by their silent countenance or open cooperation. The result and working of this state of things will be to damage the denominations and individuals opposed to secrecy, by universal opposition, and to praise and build up those that are willing to fellowship the secret orders. A common organ is therefore an absolute necessity to the denominations and individuals opposed to those orders, through which they may hear from and be strengthened by each other; to encourage and assist existing denominational papers, by helping them to facts and arguments; to aid and represent local and national conventions; and, generally, to further the views, diffuse the principles, and help carry out the measures of the "National Association."

Resolved, That we take measures at once to start a paper to be called The Christian Banner, Opposed to Secret Societies," to be issued for the present once in two weeks, at one dollar per year, as a four page six column paper. . . . .

The Cynosure debt was diminished during the month of January from $1,047.22 to $846.26. We thank all who are working for the success of the Cynosure and trust that you will feel encouraged to continue your efforts in this direction. The present season of the year is favorable for increasing the circulation of the paper, and the publishers wish to keep the command "Owe no man anything," and also wish to have the number of those who are strengthened to contend against evil by the weekly visits of the Cynosure increase daily.

THE PUBLIC LEDGER ALMANAC, is a finely prepared and printed pamphlet filled with useful information and statistics. It is presented by the enterprising publisher of the Public Ledger, Philadelphia, to all his subscribers.

BUNDLED AWAY.—Figurative language is curiously made literal sometimes. At the convention of old Anti-slavery veterans in Newport, Indiana, some weeks ago, Mr. Henry Shugart told how he once "bundled off" a fugitive under the very noses of his captors. He said he managed to get a slave away whom the slave-hunters had traced to his barn. The party knew their victim was in the barn, and they were vigilantly watching every means of escape that might be possible. Shugart (who by the way is a good Quaker), cool and deliberate, went into his barn to get fodder for his stock. The negro was soon bound up in the centre of a bunch of fodder for his cattle. He then deliberately took this upon his shoulder and threw it over the fence to them. The slave-holders were then admitted and the doors were cautiously fastened lest the slave should get away from them.

Postage on the Cynosure.

THE POSTAGE ON THE CYNOSURE MUST BE PAID AT CHICAGO. It is twenty cents a year.

The cost of postage now depends entirely on the size and weight, and therefore some smaller papers charge but fifteen cents; and others about the size of the Cynosure charge twenty-five cents a year for postage.

If the subscription price of the CYNOSURE was $2.50 or $3.00 a year, the price of many religious papers containing no more reading matter, we might afford to pay the postage ourselves, but at $2.00 a year we cannot do this with our present Subscription list.

Therefore let all send the postage, 20 cents a year, 10 cents for half a year with their renewals.

The commission on one new subscription for a year will pay the postage on your own and the new subscriber's paper. We would rather have the postage paid by commissions than in any other way.

When postage is not paid we shall have to shorten the time of subscription sufficiently to pay it.

Topics of the Time.

The National Grange met Feb. 3d at Charleston, S. C., and continued during the week. Its sessions were secret and very little news has reached us of its deliberations, one part of which was the disposition of some $125,000 surplus funds. The receipts of last year are more than $200,000, and the order is estimated to number 22,000 granges and 1,400,000 members, which is approaching the breaking point. In the States where it has been longest established there have been large secessions and many refuse to pay dues, and ritualism has proved more important than business. Considerable progress is now being made in Ohio and eastward, while, significantly, the South and Southwest are rapidly becoming the seats of grange power and population.

The carnival published to be held in New Orleans on the 9th inst., was a day or two before summarily snuffed out. Political difficulties had on the Saturday before reached a climax, a basis of settlement having been agreed upon by the Republicans and enough Conservatives to carry it into effect; but so drawn that the White Leagues, calling to mind their desperate murders of September 14th, beheld judgment impending, for the Kellogg government was to be recognized. Therefore, among the political expedients vigorously applied to break the alliance and create sympathy among lacrymose Northerners, Mardi Gras (fat Tuesday) was made a day of leanness. Extravagance and folly traveling northward, however, found congenial places at Memphis, Little Rock, and Louisville.

After a long and unquiet interval the Episcopal Diocese of Illinois has again a bishop-elect, Dr. DeKoven of Racine College. A close vote gave the preference to this gentleman, who was before a prominent candidate for the vacant bishopric of Illinois and also of Wisconsin. His extreme ritualistic views were in the way of his success; it is even reported that he is connected with the secret, Jesuitical order of his church, the "confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament." For the same high church views Dr. Seymour was refused confirmation by the General Church Convrntion last summer. DeKoven will not have to face that august body, but his confirmation may yet be prevented by the very strong opposition among the Chicago churches which developed last week into a vigorous protest to be sent to the different dioceses of the country. The bishop-elect, in a speech to a party of friends, ungraciously judged his election a vindication of Seymour and ritualism; and some of the friends more unwisely blundered in attempting to bribe the reporters to omit the indiscreet remarks. With all this shaking of the Episcopali an bush Bishop Cheney is likely to catch the birds. The confirmation of Dr. DeKoven promises to work more damage in the denomination than that of Dr. Jagger in southern Ohio, a low churchman and reputed sympathizer with Cheney in his former struggles.

Congress last week presented the anomaly of allowing pressure of business to give a law-breaker a seat in the House. Mormon apostle George Q. Cannon was sent last spring as delegate from Utah, and at the time of election was openly living with four women as wives under the system of polygamy which he notoriously upholds. The question of his admission was turned over to the committee on elections and soon after a resolution passed the House making a polygamist ineligible to a seat in Congress. This law still sleeps in some Senate committee room. In defiance of Congress Cannon went home and was elected to the Forty-fourth Congress. The House committee finally prepared a resolution for his expulsion which has been ready nearly two months, but pressure of other matters prevented its introduction except as a question of privilege; and when that was attempted Speaker Blaine put off his decision so long that the bill is given up. Undoubtedly some quiet political or Masonic wirepulling is responsible for this shamefnl direliction. When Brown of Kentucky insulted the dignity of the House the other day Dawes almost counted on a two-thirds vote of expulsion on the spot. But these resentful Congressmen can quietly allow this pollution buttoned in broadcloth to sit among them without sal-volatile or an open window.

"On Earth Peace, Good Will Towards Men."

BY JOHN G. WHITTIER.

"Put up the sword!" The voice of Christ once more
Speaks, in the pauses of the cannon's roar,
O'er fields of corn by fiery sickles reaped
And left dry ashes; over trenches heaped
With nameless dead; o'er cities starving slow
Under a rain of fire; through wards of woe
Down which a growing diapason runs
From tortured brothers, husbands, lovers, sons
Of desolate women in their far-off homes,
Waiting to hear the step that never comes!
O, men and brothers! let that voice be heard.
War fails, try peace; put up the useless sword!
Fear not the end.

There is a story told
In Eastern tents, when Autumn nights grow cold.
And round the fire the Mongol shepherds sit
With grave responses listening unto it:
Once, on the errands of his mercy bent,
Buddha, the holy and benevolent,
Met a fell monster, huge and fierce of look,
Whose awful voice the hills and forests shook.
"O, son of peace!" the giant cried, "thy fate
Is sealed at last, and love shall yield to hate."

The unarmed Buddha looking, with no trace
Of fear or anger, in the monster's face,
With pity said: "Poor fiend, even thee I love."
Lo! as he spake the sky-tall terror sank
To hand-breadth size; the huge abhorrence shrank
Into the form and fashion of a dove;
And where the thunder of its rage was heard,
Brooding above him sweetly sang the bird;
"Hate hath no harm for love," so ran the song;
"And peace unweaponed conquers every wrong!"

Is your Minister a Freemason?

IF SO, READ HOW HE WAS MADE.

MR. EDITOR:—The readers of the Cynosure will doubtless remember that in my previous communication, while explaining the manner in which the "Rev. Septimus Jones, D. D.," was made a Freemason, I was unintentionally compelled to leave him in a position that was anything but agreeable, and to which the mind of a man like Dr. Jones must be shameful and humiliating in the extreme. The idea of a gentleman of his standing and position both in the church and in society, to be compelled to kneel on the floor of that lodge-room in a half-naked condition, with his old drawers and hoodwink and rope and slipper, the laughing stock of the blaspheming Jew, the irreverent saloon-keeper, or the reckless gambler, is almost enough to strike one dumb with astonishment; or else to force upon one the conviction that any man placing himself "of his own free will and accord" in such a disgusting situation, must have lost the better portion of his reason and consequently is not responsible for his mad actions.

But, my friend, Mr. Jones, was perfectly sane. He was fishing after mysteries, the awfully profound mysteries of Freemasonry; and he wisely concluded that in order to discover the largest possible number in the shortest possible space of time, he must suffer an old dirty hoodwink to be placed over his theological eyes, and a dirty old pair of drawers to be put upon his clerical person. But to all this absurdly miserable farce there is a serious—nay, a very serious aspect. The man, and more especially the clergyman, who joins the Freemason lodge thereby sets an evil example which an after life of repentance can scarcely obliterate. If the Bible be true Freemasonry must of necessity be false, because the teachings of the Bible and of Freemasonry are diametrically opposite. Hence the clergyman, who believes in the Bible, and has been commissioned to carry its divine messages of salvation to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death, must be a hypocrite of the very worst type if he seeks initiation into a Masonic lodge and suffers himself to become a partaker in the heathen mummeries of that infidel and cut-throat society.

But, my dearly beloved Doctor, lest you should accuse me of begging the question, or drawing too much upon my imagination, let us at once proceed with the balance of your initiation, and see if some great and important secrets may not yet be hidden in the mysterious recesses of this institution which you are risking so much to join, and in search of whose mysteries you are acting even a baser part than did Peter; for of him it is recorded "he went out and wept bitterly," while you are still wedded to your idol. Your repentance is yet to come.

On the night then of your initiation, while kneeling on the floor of the lodge-room with all your peculiar surroundings, and after the presiding genius of the "brethren" had mumbled over that very edifying and soul-inspiring prayer, before alluded to, for your especial benefit, that worthy luminary approached you from the "East" with measured step and slow, wearing the everlasting stove-pipe, and in a voice intended to be very solemn, after placing his right hand upon your head, demanded, "In whom do you put your trust?" What your answer was I know not. Your trust could not surely be in the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, else you would not be found at that hour of the night kneeling on the floor of that Masonic lodge-room. Up to the present point in your Masonic researches, you must have discovered that the name of Jesus Christ has been scrupulously omitted from all the ceremonies of Freemasonry, and such you'll find the case to be, no matter how deep in the slough of iniquity you may sink, no matter how many degrees you take. Well, the "Master" took you by the right hand, ordered you to arise, follow your conductor and fear no danger. You were then conducted gropingly around the lodge-room, the assembled brethren in the meantime taking critical notes of the various parts of your peculiar clerical outfit and noting with profound interest the contour of your exposed left calf, and the whiteness of your naked left arm and left breast. You were very decorously haltered before the Junior Warden, the Senior Warden, and the Worshipful Master, "where the same questions were asked and like answers returned as at the door." You were then "ordered" to be conducted to the Senior Warden in the "West" who would teach you to approach the "East," and that profound thinker, that highly gifted individual, gave you your first lesson in the wonderful secrets of Freemasonry. He told you to "step off one step with your left foot (the naked one) and to bring the heel of the right foot to the hollow of the left. Here is something well worthy of your highest ambition! Surely here is something that will be of incalculable benefit to your congregation and to yourself in after life. Doubtless after this wonderful mystery is more fully developed and explained to you, your faith must be stronger, your aim and object in life must be higher and nobler, and you will in every way be better qualified to discharge the respective duties you owe to God, to your neighbor and to yourself. Just think of it—"step off one step with your left foot and bring the heel of your right to the hollow of your left." What a wonderful mystery! What a profound secret! But there is something to follow more mysterious still. The man with the stove-pipe then delivered you a charge (one which he had probably learned from Morgan or Richardson) in which he reminded you that you then stood before the altar of Freemasonry for the first time; that you should take upon yourself a solemn oath or obligation before proceeding any further in the solemn ceremonies in which you were then engaged, assuring you at the same time upon his honor as a man and a Mason," that there was nothing in that obligation that could conflict with any of those exalted duties you owed to God, your country, your neighbor, your family or yourself." You were jogged along towards the altar by your obliging guide, and before it you were ordered to kneel on your "naked left knee, your right forming a square; your left hand supporting the Holy Bible, square and compass; your right resting thereon," in which "due form" you took upon yourself "the solemn oath or obligation of an Entered Apprentice Mason."

Reader, will you please mark the position in which your minister was placed while gulping down the Mason's first oath: kneeling on his naked left knee; one hand supporting the Holy Bible, the other resting upon it; half naked, blind-folded, a mean looking, miserable object. I have made many a Mason in my time, but I can honestly and conscientiously affirm that whenever I saw a free man in the humiliating condition of a candidate at the Masonic altar, a sense of loathing and disgust crept over me which at times it was impossible for me to conceal, and which on many occasions manifested itself in my actions and utterances. But if the position, the "due form," be debasing, what can be said of the obligation? I give it here in full literally and correctly as it is administered in every Masonic lodge throughout the Union, and the "Rev. Septimus Jones'" congregation on reading it can form their opinion of a man who could take the Holy Bible between his clerical hands and with eager avidity swallow down such an oath:

I, 'Septimus Jones,' of my own free will and accord, in the presence of Almighty God and this worshipful lodge, erected to Him and dedicated to the holy St's John, do hereby and hereon most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear, that I will always hail, ever conceal and never reveal any of the secret arts, parts, or points of the hidden mysteries of ancient Freemasonry, which have been heretofore, may at this time, or shall be at any future period be communicated to me as such, to any person or persons whomsoever, except it be to a true and lawful brother Mason, or within a regularly constituted lodge of Masons. And neither unto him nor them until by strict trial, due examination, or legal information, I shall have found him, or them, as lawfully entitled to the same as I am myself. I furthermore solemnly promise and swear that I will not write, print, paint stamp, stain, cut, carve, mark, or engrave them, or cause the same to be done upon anything movable or immovable, capable of receiving the least impression of a word, syllable, letter or character, whereby the same may become legible or intelligible to myself or to any person under the whole canopy of heaven, and the secrets of Freemasonry be thereby unlawfully obtained through my unworthiness. To all of this I most solemnly and sincerely promise and swear with a firm and steadfast resolution to keep and perform the same, without any equivocation, mental reservation, or secret evasion of mind whatever, binding myself under no less a penalty than that of having my throat cut across, my tongue torn out by its roots and buried in the rough sands of the sea at low water mark, where the tide ebbs and flows twice in twenty-four hours, should I ever knowingly or willingly violate this my solemn oath and obligation as an Entered Apprentice Mason. So help me God and keep me steadfast in the due performance of the same."

And now, my dear clerical brother, that I have spread your first Masonic obligation out before you in all its various "promises" and "furthermores," what do you think of it? Is it not a nice thing for a man to carry with him nto the pulpit or to have about his conscience when he is addressing the throne of grace? How do you like the mild and harmless "penalty" of having your throat cut across, your tongue torn out by the roots and buried in the rough sands of the sea at low water mark? How would you like to be called upon at the next "regular" of your lodge to hunt me up and cut my throat, or to cut the throat of a brother clergyman? And yet you are liable to be called upon at any moment to do this very thing if you are in "good standing." Shame upon the society that imposes such blood-thirsty obligations upon its members, and shame ten thousand times over on the minister of the Gospel who will affiliate with, and vindicate the principles of such a nefarious organization. Truly in the words of the apostle, "God shall send them strong delusion that they should believe a lie."

It is not my purpose at present, my Rev. brother, to accompany you any further in your initiation. I leave you still on your knees and will give you ample time to digest your innocent little obligation, penalty and all. I shall return to you again, however, and carry you right through to the end until you are once more in the "preparation room," "clothed and in your right mind," carefully noting at every step each secret as it is presented and examining every mystery as it is unfolded. It would be well, however, to sum up the case thus far, if it were only to show you what progress you have made, the amount of useful knowledge you have acquired, the secret mysteries imparted to you and the probable advantages resulting therefrom in your future intercourse with your fellow-men.

First, then, comes your "preparation" with the accompanying drawers, hoodwink, etc.; second, your demand for admittance and that little bogus dialogue; third, your "entrance" and being received upon the point of a sharp instrument pressing your naked left breast, called by Masons the "Shock of Entrance;" fourth, your kneeling for prayer and your public profession of semi-infidelity or theism; fifth, your perambulation around the lodge; sixth, your astonishing first step with your naked left foot; and lastly, your peculiar due-form and cut-throat obligation.

Is there any thing in this tomfoolery worthy even the bare thought of a sensible man? Is there any thing in it for which any respectable citizen would spend one hour away from his family, or for which he would spend one cent; and yet ministers of the Gospel are found who indulge in this miserable farce and who assist to perpetuate this gigantic fraud upon their fellow-men. It is to be hoped that the time is coming when the curse of Freemasonry and kindred secret societies shall be swept from this free land; when justice shall be untramelled; and when the divine attributes of benevolence and charity shall no longer be a cloak for the nefarious practices of the lodge-room. One means, I believe, of accomplishing this grand result, is to spread broadcast throughout the country the pretended secrets of these societies and especially Freemasonry, and then every man, woman and child throughout the land being in possession of their wonderful mysteries, so-called, none will be found foolish enough to pay money for them, and so their goat must die. To aid in bringing about this result shall be the future aim of the

EN ROUTE FOR FLORIDA.

The modern railroad is truly a great achievement, so far as taking one comfortably and rapidly to the desired haven is concerned. But alas, human imperfection attaches itself to all of man's works, and nothing is perfect and complete like the Creator's. The majestic engine does any amount of puffing, blowing and screeching before it starts on its journey, and friction and noise attend its whole course; while our daily journey through space, on the world's car, at an inconceivably rapid rate is accomplished without noise or apparent motion, and so perfect is the illusion that only the strongest scientific proof could convince man that the earth moves at all, and is not the center of the universe. Our Creater "speaks and it is done. He commands and it stands fast." But we poor mortals may well rejoice that while we cannot attain to him, we are made in his image, and can go on improving and inventing things to promote the comfort and meet the exigences of ourselves and fellow-men.

About thirty years ago our first advent into Indiana was made in a stage-coach, from Madison to near Indianapolis, on part of the same route we are now on. Two days were occupied in the journey; and so flooded was the country by recent rains that ever and anon all the male hands in the coach were in requisiton to aid in raising the sinking vehicle out of the mud by means of rails. A dreary ride would it have been had not the vivacity and good humor of the party been equal to the emergency. How poorly would such accommodations meet present demands! Our locomotive with its well filled train may well smile at the poor stage-coach in the mud. As we advance south the scenery becomes more pleasant and must be very beautiful when summer adds its charms. Patches of snow and ice are seen as far as Nashville. At Chattanoga we leave the direct route to Nashville, Florida, to visit friends in Gadsden, Alabama. This is a town of 1,500 inhabitants on the Coosa river.

Our friend's residence is situated on a slope at the southern termination of the Lookout Mountain Range. It is a long, one-story house (like many in this region) with spacious rooms, and long verandah in front. Here we sit down on a rustic seat and take a survey of the pleasent garden below. On one side is a large crape myrtle tree, which is grown as a hot-house shrub at the North. Clumps of roses and honeysuckles and other shrubs are seen in all directions; some green and others just ready to burst into light. A large Pyrus Japonica full of flower buds will soon be in a blaze of glory. Bulbous plants are up and early hyacinths are budded for bloom. Peacocks with their gay plumage stroll slyly upon the scene, trailing their long brilliant feathers on the ground, as the modern belle her skirts. Across the road is a cluster of buildings including the stable and several log houses, occupied by colored people; at the left of these is a cotton gin, and back of them runs the Coosa river, navigable for steamboats to Rome, Ga. Although everything external is so spring like, it is unusually cold here, and warm fires in the large, open fire places are necessary for comfort. The cool air—bracing too—which is allowed free course through the open door and lightly built houses, has a chilling effect upon us used to close rooms and furnace heat. The "old sexton's" plea for pure air would not be needed here, in the churches or elsewhere.

We improve the first warm sunshiny day to make a trip of three miles up the mountains to "Nocholula," or Black Creek Falls. Our party of six, including colored driver, start about ten in the morning, in a spring wagon drawn by mules. The air is delightful and inspiring. Our road lies mostly through pine woods, with here and there what seems at first a village, but is only a farm house with its usual cluster of out houses and tenant dwellings. In one place we pass by a woman washing under the pine trees, beating her clothes with a flat stick on a table—a common mode in this region. We see for the first time the long-leaved pine tree, a beautiful variety peculiar to the South. After ascending several steep hills we reach a level space on which is a cluster of dilapidated houses, reminding some of our party of the good times before the war, when this was a place of great resort and a flourishing boarding house was kept.

Here we tie our mules and commence our descent into the rocky ravine, through which Black Creek flows, after tumbling over rocks eighty feet in height. On the stairs that aid our descent we have a fine view of the falls several hundred feet distant, and on reaching the foot a scene of the most wild and romantic beauty presents itself. The creek is not wide, but rocks are piled on rocks and scattered in the utmost confusion along its bank. Mosses of every shade and variety attain most luxuriant growth on these, and clumps of lovely ferns extend their long, graceful fronds from the nooks and crevices. We follow a narrow path under the perpendicular rocks that line the ravine, which becomes shelving and of horse shoe form, as we approach the falls, leaving a span under the rocks of about seventy feet directly behind the falls. And now if we have never dared or desired to pass under the "Horse Shoe Falls" at Niagara, we may perform a similar feat on a smaller scale and with less peril, for here we have ample space to pass under the falls to the other side without getting wet; and as for the roar, it is quite loud enough to inspire awe, if not terror, and to give one a touch of the sublime. In this mockery of nature a literal board was spread for us, by youthful hands, and we lunched, feeling the spray of the falls on our cheeks and viewing the beautiful rainbows at its base, which they say are always seen here when the sun shines.

We return well pleased with Nature's works, and yet we cannot wholly despise the poor attempts to imitate her that we see in some of our gardens at home, for they show at least an appreciation of her beauties, and may lead to a mingling of art with nature with the happiest effect.

Paramount Rights.

Mr. Editor:—In the Cynosure of December 31st, last, in an article entitled "Reasons for the Religious Amendment," I find an old political heresy reiterated, long since put to shame and silence by Gerrit Smith and his associates; to-wit: In organizing government it becomes necessary for each individual to give up some of his natural rights; and that the primary object sought in government should be the greatest good to the greatest number.

Does it not illustrate the fact that eternal vigilance is the price of human liberty, that such a doctrine should be reproduced and published to the world on the very day that its most illustrious opponent was put under the sod?

All who believe in divine revelation also believe that our natural rights, the same as our life, came to us from the hands of our Creator. If so, have we any more right to surrender the one than the other? All such also believe that civil government is ordained of God. If so, can civil government require the surrender of God-given rights?

We do not deny that our natural or God-given rights may be refined, qualified, or perhaps limited to surrounding circumstances. For instance, if I am the only person in the world, I may have a right to monopolize the entire blessings of earth. But when earth is peopled with its millions of equals my natural right embraces only an equal share. So with the only child, his right to inheritance is governed by the fact of his being the only heir. When an equal brother is born, his rights are not surrendered, but simply defined and qualified by the circumstances. What we do claim is this, that any legislative enactment that seeks to deprive beings made by God of God-given rights, are acts of usurpation, of no binding force upon moral agents so long as the Supreme Ruler of the universe claims the right to rule the subjects of his own creation.

We also claim that the primary object of any rightly constituted government is to seek the greatest good of the whole. That the majority, however mighty they may be, cannot lawfully deprive the smallest minority of the most insignificant right. To yield this point is to commit moral and political suicide; is to go back on our record; is to lose all we have gained by oceans of blood, a million of lives and billions of money. In a word, it is to yield the whole to the devil to say that might makes right, and that minorities have no rights that majorities are bound to respect.

Let the reader bear in mind that moral law is not the subject of creation; it never was and never can be created, but is the great unchangable principle of right by which God governs himself and the universe; that God never has delegated authority to man to do wrong. Man cannot delegate authority he does not possess himself. Hence it follows that whenever legislative enactments do not conform to this principle of right, they are only acts of usurpation; should not be respected; and where they enjoin moral wrong should not be obeyed.

Yours for the truth,

Samuel Hale.

Not this Man, but Barabbas.

Pilate was conscious that Jesus was an innocent person. He therefore desired his release. But after trying various expedients to relieve himself from the unwelcome task of murdering an innocent man, the thought occurred to him that he could turn the old custom of releasing a prisoner at the feast to good account on the present occasion. And as Barabbas was very notorious as a criminal under sentence of death, under the charge of sedition, insurrection and murder, it was surely very reasonable in Pilate to suppose that between these two widely different characters, these high priests and elders would, with one voice, cry out, "Let Barabbas, the notorious robber and murderer, first expiate his crimes." But, to the astonishment of this heathen judge, all with one voice cried out, "Not this man, but Barabbas." Pilate was shocked by this exhibition of moral turpitude, and he still withtsood their murderous clamor, until they touched his weak point, viz., his ambition for place and power. They said, "If thou let this man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend." If you let this man go, we will report you to Cæsar as being treacherous in guarding and protecting the Roman government. You, sir, know that this Jesus claims to be a king; and you know that whosover maketh himself a king speaketh against Caesar, and stands opposed to Caesar's government. This fallacious appeal to Pilate's selfishness and ambition was sufficient to neutralize all his moral convictions and make him become a mere tool in the hands of this murderous mob.

This same tragedy is almost litterly re-enacted in Freemasory, and the other kindred secret combinations of the present day. I well know the Freemason will rage, and blaspheme under this withering charge, but let him writhe as he may, the fact that the very name of Jesus is ignored in the lodge prayers of Masons, stands out in bold letters in the pages of many, if not in all the Masonic standard authors. These writers assume, that as unity in the lodge-room must be secured, it therefore becomes imperative that the same Masonic level and square be applied to Jesus, the Christian's Saviour, as to all the false Christs which pagan nations worship. By the highest dicta of Masonic law, Jesus, the Christian's Saviour, is ignored and crucified, and Barabbas of Masonry is released and enthroned. Not this man Jesus in our Masonic prayers and in our lodge-room, but Barabbas, the robber. All Freemasons by their presence in the lodge-room, whether consciously or unconsciously, do enact the same murderous tragedy of the Jewish high priests before the bar of Pilate. Not this man, but Barabbas. Let Jesus be crucified, that Masonry may live and prevail.

Pilate was a heathen. The Jewish high priests were the representatives of the Jewish church. Between these parties the heathen judge was the least criminal. And so it is with Masons. The open enemies of God, the wilful rejecters of the Lord Jesus Christ, the drunkard, the debauchee, the Jew, the infidel, the Turk, or the worshiper of Confucius or Brigham Young, may, as Masons, for ought I know, plead some extenuation for their awful guilt. But what plea can professed friends of Jesus make who have publicly declared before the world that this Jesus was their Saviour, and only hope, and those professed ministers of the cross who are looked up to as lights to the world, standing in the sacred desk, and with all apparent earnestness inviting and entreating poor lost sinners to come to Jesus that they may be saved? And—be astonished, O Heavens,—perhaps in the dark hours of that same night, these same professed ministers of the Gospel of Jesus are found in the lodge-room, in sworn league and brotherly embrace, with many of the open and avowed enemies of Jesus. And more awful still, that by the highest law which governs this midnight conclave, the very name of this Saviour Jesus is ignored, if not in words, the fact is louder than words,—"Not this man, but Barabbas;" "Crucify him, crucify him." If any transaction on earth would induce the inhabitants of hell to hold a grand jubilee in honor and gratitude to Masonic ministers, I cannot conceive an occasion equal to this in its terrible enormity and wickedness.

Sayings of Spurgeon.

Spurgeon senteniously expresses a number of thoughts "worth remembering," in the following appropriate sentences, which he publishes as advice gratis:

Nothing is more like an honest man than a thorough rogue.

When you see a man with a great deal of religion displayed in his shop window, you may depend upon it, he keeps but a small stock within.

Do not choose your friend by his looks; handsome shoes often pinch the feet.

Do not be fond of compliments; remember "thank you pussy, and thank you pussy," killed the cat.

Don't believe those who talk the most, for mewing cats are seldom good mousers.

By no means put yourself in another persons' power; if you put your thumbs between two grinders, thy are very apt to bite.

Drink nothing without seeing it; sign nothing without reading it; and make sure that it means no more than it says.

Don't go to law unless you have nothing to lose; lawyers' houses are built on fool's heads.

Put no dependence on the label of a bag, and count money after your own kind.

In any business never wade into water where you can't see the bottom.

See the bag opened before you buy what is in it, for he who trades in the dark asks to be cheated.

MR. CLARK'S COMPANY AND MR. HICKMAN'S REGIMENT.—Our friends above mentioned propose to aid in extending the circulation of the Cynosure. Mr. Hickman asked for one thousand persons who would pledge themselves to secure for the Cynosure six subscribers (for a year) to be obtained during 1875. Mr. Clark pledged himself to be one of a hundred to send in five subscriptions with $10.00. He writes: "Please let me know how the list of the one hundred comes on."

Thirty-one persons have reported themselves for Mr. Hickman's regiment. Five for Mr. Clark's company. All in the regiment belong in Mr. Clark's company, of course, making thirty-six volunteers. We want sixty-four more to fill up the company. They are wanted immediately. Mr. Clark's offer will not hold through the year. Shall we not have sixty-four more volunteers? If you cannot forward the money to-day please send your name, and let the money follow as soon as possible.

We hope this subject will be pressed by lecturers and other friends at all appropriate meetings. Let us have the sixty-four immediately to fill out the little company. Will the Ohio, Wisconsin and Iowa conventions take particular notice and comply with the request? Do not forget that the regiment is to be filled after the company is completed.

Quarterly Meeting of the State Association at Factoryville, Pa.

UNIONDALE, Pa., Feb. 4, '75.

The Penn. State Association held its first quarterly meeting at Factoryville, January 27th and 28th. A few brethren came together in the forenoon of Tuesday, the 26th, and had a brief season of prayer. At 2 P. M. the first session opened with an hour of prayer and conference, in which God's blessing was sought upon our meetings and work, and upon the cause in general. At the close of this devotional meeting which was participated in by several brethren, Rev. A. L. Post, our President, proposed that we spend the afternoon in free conference. The session was one of great interest, and remarks were made by brethren Post, Callender, Raynor, Bertels, Brink, C. Parker, Moore, Green, Cobb and Hall. It was moved that all friends be invited to participate, and speak freely their views.

Many excellent points were brought out, to-wit: that Christ is with us and our cause will be protected if it is his; that there is an encouraging progress, yet a great need of labor to enlighten the poople; that our work is one of truth and right against organized secret wrongs; that we need to exercise forbearance, and proceed in the spirit of Christian love; that secretism is an antagonist to Christian progress and experience; and that God will eventually overthrow all secret institutions. It was moved the Rev. A. L. Post lecture in the evening and that a half-hour previous be given to prayer.

In the evening, Bro. Post gave his masterly lecture on the opposition of secret orders to Christianity. The lecture was well attended, and listened to with marked attention.

Wednesday, both morning and afternoon, was devoted to general discussion, and the sessions were of a social and instructive character. The attendance was very good and those who where present had a deeper interest awakened, and were strengthened in their purpose to labor with firmer faith and zeal against the giant power of secretism.

A lecture was given in the evening by Rev. J. W. Raynor, mostly devoted to the false principles of Odd-fellowship. The town of Factoryville, where our meeting was held, is burdened with the usual secret orders, and the Keystone Academy, a Baptist institution located here, has the Masonic emblems and date on its corner-stone.

We hope, however, that good was done, and look forward to the time when churches and ministers and society in its better element will be delivered from the despotism and ungodliness of the lodge. Those of our State Association who were present, saw abundant reason to thank God and take courage.

Adjourned Wednesday evening, to meet again on the call of the Ex. Committee. JAMES W. RAYNOR.

Michigan Correspondence—What we need—Two more Heroes Gone.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—There is no feature, it seems to me, of more importance, in the work of the National Christian Association than that of organization. Much has already been done in this direction, but very much remains to be done. There are in Michigan for instance, quite a number of anti-secrecy organizations, but there is no bond of union between them except the essential one of principle. But this is not enough; there needs to be, and there must be, organic union, or all efforts to disseminate our views will be isolated, spasmodic, and comparatively barren of results. The various secret orders understand this, hence their organizations are as perfect as the ingenuity of man can invent. We may well learn a lesson of our enemies in this respect. "The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light." Organized secrecy is a power in our land and can only be successfully encountered by an organized opposition.

The call for a convention composed of the opponents of secret societies in this State comes none too soon, and every sincere friend of our cause should plan at once to attend, or if that is not possible, then assist some one else to go in his place. I shall look with intense interest for the progress of the arrangements for the meeting.

Two of our strong men and ardent friends of the anti-secrecy cause have passed away recently.

REV. JOHN THOMAS

died in October last at the residence of his son in Fairfield, Mich. He was an early and warm friend of our cause here and also at Blackbury, Ill., where he had charge of a Free-will Baptist church at the time of his death, being here on a visit when he died. He was a man of warm heart and generous impulses, and was one of the few ministers of the present day who had the courage to say "Masonry" in the pulpit.

REV. ROBERT POWELL

passed away the 15th of January last, in the 85th year of his age. He entered the ministry of the Baptist church in 1817. Feeling his need of additional advantages, he was induced shortly after, to join the Masons, being told by members of the fraternity that a knowledge of the mysteries of the order would aid him greatly in understanding the Bible. He took the first and second degrees with the usual feeling of disappointment, but was told that the third degree would make everything clear. He went forward, when disappointment culminated in disgust; as it will with every thoroughly honest man. He shortly after renounced and denounced the order amid threats of vengeance on the part of the "old hand-maid," and was ever after an earnest opposer of the whole system of secret societies. He has written and published considerably on the subject and lectured whenever opportunity offered. He delivered three lectures here in Fairfield three or four years since, and the writer well remembers his description of being "brought to light."

Said he, "When the bandage fell from my eyes and I saw, instead of great light, only three tallow candles and myself in a half-naked condition, surrounded by a crowd of men some of whom I knew to be immoral and drinking men, I felt like a fool."

Is not his experience that of every other God-fearing man who has been deluded as he was into joining the lodge? O that every such one possessed his moral courage to follow his conscience and Christian duty!

In an obituary notice published in the Herald and Torchlight, the Baptist paper of Michigan, the writer alluded to the efforts of Father Powell, in harmonizing churches distracted on the subject of Masonry, at the time of the Morgan tragedy, but failed to state on which side he stood. But this is the style of popular journalism of the present day, to publish what people wish to hear, or what will not offend them rather than what they need to know. May God raise up other men to take the place of these fallen heroes.

From Central Illinois—A Book to Conceal Masonry—Hints to Smugglers—Debates.

JACKSONVILLE, Ill., Feb. 8, 1875.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

Knowing you are ever pleased to receive cheering words from your friends, I snatch a few spare moments to write you a few lines. Your valuable and highly esteemed Cynosure is ever anxiously looked for and contents greedily devoured, and when read, it is sent to some one else to peruse; perhaps to some one who is not aware of the hydra-headed monster which lurks about in secrecy and darkness; or is sent to some honest man of the "Frtty" (as their strictly private work terms the clan, a copy of which I have). Honest man, I say?—yes, there are some of that class who belong to the ancient Free and Accepted Masonic lodges here. Honest?—yes, when you don't say anything about their pet institution within their hearing or the length of their slip noose, or cable-tow. Some of them have had the audacity to deny the Morgan murder point blank, and they members of good standing in the M. E. church. Another good member told his wife he had never been cable-towed, and he had taken three degrees. Strange! Of such is the kingdom of Masonry. I was very strongly impressed this morning with the S. S. lesson upon Achan's sin, and thought upon reading Joshua vii. 13, that we had a parallel here in our midst, and as antagonistic to the Christian church and its prosperty as Achan's sin was to the success of the Lord's host in Joshua's time. Verily there is an "accursed thing" in our midst, and may God speed the day when it shall be uprooted and destroyed!

I had the pleasure of talking with a Rev. brother, who is one of the craft, and he assured me upon parting that some of my views were highly erroneous. I am ever ready to stand corrected when I am in the wrong, but am not willing to stand corrected merely upon the "say-so" of one who still adheres to his creed, and does not bring forth any proof to show that I am wrong.

"Ecce Orienti" is red hot (vulgarly speaking). Upon receiving it and glancing through it, I first thought that I had drawn an elephant sure enough. Any one could have bought my $3.00 worth for half price,—"intelligible to the initiated only." But remembering the old adage, "Where there's a will there's a way," I went to work on the thing, and subdued it, and can read it as well as I can a primer. So much for the first three degrees of Essenes; intelligible only to the initiated; sold to members of the order only; price, three dollars. I thought it was costly at the time, but now would not take twice the amount for it. I find it is about the same as Morgan's Revelation, and yet I have been told that Morgan's Masonry and the Masonry of 1875 are entirely different.

I must close by stating a little incident which occurred not long since in a U. S. Custom-House. A lady of this city with whom I am personally acquainted, came from across the Atlantic not long since with her brother, and previous to their sailing, he purchased two Masonic regalias, and placed one in the top of each trunk. Upon their arrival in the U. S. the Custom House officer took their keys, unlocked the trunks and gave the keys to the owners without further examination. This is another of the sublime beauties of being one of the "Frtty."

Bro. Samuel French called upon me the other day. He is as wide awake as ever; had his armour on and his pocket full of tracts. The secret society men have been trying to get Mr. French hushed up by arguing the question with him. They have met twice and will continue it next Wednesday evening at the Chapin Schoolhouse, which is near Mr. French's home. The arguments have been with Odd-fellows mainly. The Masonic argument, you are aware, is to maintain a silent tongue.

Let the outside world your Masonic character demean,
You shut your mouth, and keep your lamb-skin apron clean.

More anon, BEN. F. COLE.

Morgan's Jailor.

The names of the men who were prominent in early Anti-masonic times,—whether as Masons, Anti-masons, or jacks,—were indelibly impressed on my mind when young, and I have always followed them with peculiar interest. It has been a satisfaction to know that the part taken by Wm. H. Seward, Thurlow Weed, Millard Fillmore, Francis Granger, John Quincy Adams, Thadeus Stevens, and others, in exposing the foul deeds of Masonry did not operate to hinder, but rather promoted their subsequent influence and political advancement. In my own judgment their early stand against secret societies was the most meritorious act of their lives. For this they and their associates, in the conflict of 1827–30, will always be remembered with gratitude by those who sympathize with efforts to expose the secret works of darkness. Not long since I read in the Cynosure of the death of Col. Davis C. Miller, at Chambersburg, Pa., at the advanced age of 80. I do not think that he died regretting his co-operation with Morgan in publishing Masonry to the world, although he suffered considerably from the vengeance of the craft at the time.

The men who were conspicuous, as Masons, in the outrages against life and liberty in western New York, and in efforts to stifle investigation, I well remember also, and have followed them with interest. Many of them came West, after the excitement made it uncomfortable for them to remain East, and a large number of them to Michigan. Cheesebrough and Sawyer died in or near Kalamazoo; Ketchum at Marshall, and Ganson at Jackson, one of the hardest of his race. I may say also that the first two above mentioned found at Kalamazoo Anthony Cooley and John Hascall, the latter of whom did valiant service in rescuing Miller from his abductors and both of whom were efficient in exposing the deeds of the Masonic conspirators. Quite recently I learned that the death of Israel R. Hall, who was Morgan's jailor at Canandaigua, occurred about two years since in Branch county, Michigan, which leads me to speak of one who, in the dialect of "Forty years ago," was termed a Mason's "jack."

The jack was neither Mason nor Anti-mason. He was one under Masonic influence, a man who would defend Masonry, carry a Masonic burden and do his dirty work. Masonry found it convenient to use just such tools at times; and as the jailor at Canandaigua was not a Mason, they thought themselves fortunate in finding in him one who would serve their purpose almost as well. To accomplish their designs on Morgan, it was necessary to get him out of jail at a particular moment, or when the carriage in which he was to be conveyed away could be got in readiness. The conspirators arranged the matter by first changing the complaint against Morgan from a criminal to civil one, making it possible for him to be discharged by the payment of a small claim, and then inducing Hall, the keeper, to be absent from the jail at the time Morgan was to be called for. Accordingly, when Lawson and his fellows came for Morgan, they found Mrs. Hall in charge, who, after a brief parley, and the assurance from leading men that it would be all right to let the prisoner go, on the payment of the claim, consented to do so.

Whether there was collusion between Hall and his wife in regard to the surrender of Morgan, I cannot say. It would not be inferred from her diposition, on the trial of Cheesbrough, Lawson and Sawyer, that there was. But there is no doubt but that there was a perfect understanding between Hall and the Masonic kidnappers, and that he hid himself on the occasion in pursuance of an arrangement with them, and to avoid a responsibility. This is perfectly well understood among Hall's neighbors in Branch county, among whom he has been wont to converse with considerable freedom of the part he had in the Morgan abduction. He affirmed that he was never a Mason, but boasted that he had personal knowledge of the fact of Morgan's incarceration, and that he knew how and why he was released from jail at Canandaigua. The report current among Hall's neighbors in Michigan is that he did not play tool and jack without a pecuniary consideration; a view which was strengthened in their minds by the fact that, though he was a poor man in Canandaigua, he became the possessor of a large and beautiful farm in the State to which he emigrated. As jack and Judas, he doubtless had his reward; whether that was in the form of a "bag" which he brought with him to the West, or in a reputation which followed him, and which was ever a bar to his furth er civil promotion,—a thing of which he complained to his townsmen, as a punishment greater than he deserved,—I will not undertake to say. At all evnts, I do not envy the jack, either his character or his money. MARK.

Is It a "New Departure?"

ORANGEVILLE, Ill., Feb. 1, 1875.

The Masons of the lodge at Orangeville, Stephenson county, Ill., recently enstalled their newly-elected officers. Several items in their ceremonies seemed novel to me. In the charge delivered to the Worshipful Master that functionary was directed to "show no countenance to seceded Masons," thus acknowledging the existence of such as profess to reveal the secrets of the order.

Again, it was asserted that Masonry could be all learned from their books, except grips, signs, and pass-words which are used for their protection. This was sternly denied when Rev. P. Hurless delivered his series of lectures in this place.

But what to me was most remarkable of all was the ceremony of installing, as Chaplain, a private member of one of the churches of this place and dubbing him "Reverend."

The above ceremonies of a heathenish institution were held in one of our Christian churches, to the humiliation and disgust of the better part of the membership; the minister in charge attempting to pray the thing into respectability, an undertaking that he is not likely to repeat very soon. How long will the disciples of Christ submit to such degredation in their houses which were once given to God for sacred purposes? J. DODSON.

"He That Doeth Truth Cometh to the Light."

POMEROY, O.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

A few words from the southern borders of Ohio may not be uninteresting to Anti-masons. I regard Freemasonry as an antagonist to all just rules of right and wrong, either of church or state. It has all to do with the present outrages of the South, and the "hissing" of Northern sympathizers. It has demoralized our nation and tramples under foot the laws of a just God. I am glad that we have good men in the field who are not afraid to breast the storm in its fury, and to fight for the right in this great and much needed reform. God speed them on; and may our national organ, the Cynosure, still continue to float all along the lines until "old Jericho's" walls shall tumble and fall. "The war is inevitable and must go on." Though Masons may "egg" us and "mob" us, but, as O. Scott, during the anti-slavery reform, said, "When you put out the burning mountains, and roll back the falls of Niagara, you may think to stop the slave discussion by mobs! Our cause shall triumph though at the expense of our blood. We are ready to give up our lives, but not our principles. In God we trust."

So say we. I am with others, moving on in the strife; have delivered no lectures, but am scattering Cynosures and Heralds, and using what the Apostle James calls "the unruly member." We need some of your best tracts. When we present the subject, they are apt to say, "we don't know," and "need light." If we are to get it by being blindfolded and cable-towed and traveling toward the East after it, I think we will remain in darkness until the judgment. It ought to be exposed "in all the length and breadth of its damnable iniquity." "How long, oh Lord, holy and true, dost thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth!"—Rev. 6. 10.

OUR MAIL.

Andrew Blair, Tiffin, O., writes:

"I am trying to circulate your valuable paper all I can. . . . When I go to visit my friends, I put one in my pocket and leave it with them. I am fifty-five years old, but expect to live to see secret societies come to an end."

W. H. Linam, Pine Apple, Ala., writes:

"I send you a few names on the petition. I could send more, but I am old, and do not go about much. . . . We have a number of Anti-masons here, but they will not take any part as yet. I have been fighting Masonry in the church for twenty years. . . We cannot have a candidate for office here unless he belongs to some secret society. I do not vote on that account. I pray for a reform."

J. R. Rodgers, Rosepoint, Pa., writes:

"Being a visitant at the house of Mr. John Love, of Rosepoint, and having access to his weekly news, my attention was turned to your paper (the Cynosure), and believing it to be something we need in this age of secret societies, I procured a number of the paper before mentioned, and have canvassed a little, the result I will inclose."

Mr. Rodgers sends eleven subscriptions. We hope others will follow his example.

Benjamin Smith, Vincent, Mich., writes:

"I am with you in your efforts to crush the monster evil of secrecy, by the dissemination of Gospel light, through the excellent paper published at your office."

George McCullough, College Springs, Ia., writes:

"The more I read the Cynosure the more I want to read and circulate it; and I would be glad to see its sentiments, not only read, but deeply impressed on the minds of the people."

William Parkis, Goodrichville, Mich., writes:

"We have had Rev. John Levington, Mr. Stoddard and Elder Baird to lecture here, so that we are very well posted on heathenism. But what shall we say of Flint and Saginaw? The mantle of secretism is spread over them so that they are in darkness. Who will open the window and let some light into those dark dens?

D. S. McConihay, Lewiston, W. Va., writes:

"If I had sent on at first and got some more petitions, I think I could have collected a thousand names with ease, by sending in different directions. Although I was a rebel, and was during the war, and my father was a slaveholder, yet neither of us believe in oath-bound societies. He is eighty-one years old. John McConihay is his name. He knows all about the Morgan time. There are thousands that are opposed to oath-bound societies that have not detected the wrong there was in slavery, and as a reformed drunkard can bear the strongest evidence against intemperance, so I can of rebellion testify that the love of God can change the lion into a lamb. I could not think of doing without the Cynosure. Consider me a life member of the National Christian Association."

"A young friend in Princeton, Ind., writes:

"I subscribed for the Cynosure for three months, and I intended to discontinue it at the end of that time for two reasons: First, for financial reasons; and second, for injury I sustain from Masonry. I am a carpenter by trade, and have to depend upon the public in general for employment; and as I have expressed my opinion in regard to Masonry somewhat freely, I have been made to feel the effects of its power and malevolent influence pretty severely; and should it become known that I take the Cynosure, they in their secret workings would ruin my business occupation altogether. If I were a farmer, and independent of the public for my living, I would not care to fight the whole clan. But I believe I will trust in God and defy the powers of darkness."

If you are true to Christ and diligent in your business, you can go forward boldly. The righteous are not forsaken.

D. L. Jones, Hawkeye, Neb., writes:

"I have got my eyes open in regard to secret societies as I never had them before. The people almost all belong to some secret society around here, and I am in hopes to make a stir among the dry bones."

H. C. Stoughton, Duncan, Ill., writes:

"When I cannot succeed in getting a full subscriber, I get two or three neighbors to club together and pay for it between them. . . I have taken the Cynosure for five years and think more of it every year."

William Slossen, Chenango Bridge, N. Y., writes:

"New York State is the hotbed of the Freemasons in this country, and this is the field for good lecturers. If once the stronghold is broken up the rest will be an easy matter. I shall labor with my might to forward the cause."

Gerard Cutler, Galva, Ill., writes:

"I intend to continue the war upon that infernal institution as long as I live."

Sanford Ward, Adams, N. Y., writes:

"I think Masonry is the greatest piece of infidelity in the world. I stand alone in opposing it in Adams. I am glad to learn that good is being done in other places, and that the eyes of some are being opened to see the wickedness of Masonry."

T. Wenner, Dayton, Ind., has been working for the Cynosure, and writes:

"I shall try again."

Our German, Lutheran friends have many of them done nobly in circulating the petition to Congress.

Joseph S. Perry, Thompson, Conn., writes:

"Mr. John Levington gave three lectures at Putnam. I rode seven miles to hear him. The Masons say he has been blackballed three times, and does not know anything about Masonry, and yet one Mason admitted to me that he told me that he told the truth. . . . I do not believe any man can be a Mason and a Christian at the same time. . . May God hasten the day when men will be men and turn away from all the secret works of darkness."

R. M. Webb, Watkins, Ia., writes:

"My heart is with you in this great reform. My prayer is that all that is done may be done in the fear of the Lord. Not fearing him that can kill the body, . . but rather fearing him who is able to destroy both soul and body in hell."

A. S. Wetsel, Dunkirk, Ind., writes:

"The cause is gaining. There are a great number of true friends in this part of the country, and as soon as we get our church done (which will be next summer), I want to have a course of lectures in it. Many of my poor neighbors are being swindled by those secret institutions out of their money and get nothing in return. O for the time when the churches will become pure and will not be governed by the enemy of souls!"

H. J. Mulholland, Mound City, Ill., writes:

"I love to remain on this elevated spot where I can see the conflict raging. It does my very soul good to hear the report of your guns as they open upon the enemy's works. . . Secrecy is a mighty foe, and it will require a desperate effort, but if we continue to sound the war cry, the victory is sure."

G. Helber, Logan, O., writes, (sending thirty-six voters' names):

"You sent me two petitions not legal voters; therefore I delayed circulating them. I might have done better had I commenced in time. They are principally United Brethren."

E. Bascom, Greensburgh, O., writes:

"I could have got many more if I could have given my time to it."

Jesse Hunter, Freeport, Ill., sends the names of one hundred and sixty-four legal voters, and writes:

"If I could have canvassed the entire country I could have obtained from five hundred to eight hundred names."

J. W. McPherson, Peace, Kan., writes:

"The grange and (so-called) temperance societies have gathered in nearly all the larger ones have left. Some of the old and tried Quakers joined the grange."

C. R. Williams, Terryville, Ct., writes:

"The influence of the dark orders is very strong here, and the names of those doing anything in opposition are cast out as vile, . . but a bold opposition is a more effectual shield than a fearful one."

Rev. C. F. Rosseau, Altamont, Ill., writes:

"I forward herewith the names of one hundred and one. All members of the German Lutheran church, Bethlehem, Ill."

Our readers will notice that nearly all who write say they could have obtained many more if they had time and strength for canvassing.

S. Wood, Bloomville, N. Y., writes:

"I send you your petition with one hundred and fifty legal voters' names. They are (all but fifteen) of this election district, which only polled one hundred and eighty votes at the last election. So you see that there is a large per cent. Anti-masonic. This county (Deleware) gives about eight hundred republican majority; but last fall they put a Mason on for the District Attorney, and the Democrats nominated an anti-secret man, and he was elected by about four hundred majority. The republican candidate for assembly was Anti-masonic, and he got four hundred majority in this assembly district."

A. Baker, Tiskilwa, Ill., writes:

"I think secretism here is on the wane. Our Baptist and Methodist ministers are both anti-secret men; one of them told me that if he was in my place he would do all he could for the cause."

Hiram Preston, Lincklaen, N. Y., writes:

"I have obtained two hundred and twenty-five names. One hundred are legal voters."

M. Harbaugh, West Salem, O., sends one hundred and thirty-five names.

James Reide, Simsbury, Ct., writes:

"I am well satisfied Masonry is an awful wicked system, but God is shedding his own light on the darkness through the Cynosure and his faithful servants."

Robert Shaw, Saegerstown, Pa., writes:

"I think I can see a great deal of difference in the people. There are some that signed this that would not last May, when I was around. . . I will see you all at Pittsburgh at the convention if my health will admit."

Rev. A. S. Haliday, North Otselic, N. Y., writes:

"There are many who are in favor of abolishing Freemasonry and other associations of a similar character, such as Oddfellows, Orangemen, etc., who would sign this paper if it did not exclude the temperance secrecy. Nevertheless, if it comes to a crisis, I think you can depend upon their co-operation in the abolishing of these accursed institutions."

Ella Reidy, Wallaceton, Pa., writes:

"I think you cannot have the least idea how dark this small corner of the earth is. Those who are not in fellowship with the orders, fear the multitude and love popularity. Numbers of persons would get very angry when I would ask them to sign the petition. Others who did sign were so alarmed that they came and begged to take their names off the paper."

Benjamin Ulsh, Silver Lake, Ind., sends two hundred and fourteen names.

Almon Smith, Plank Road, N. Y., writes:

"I am totally blind or I could have gotten more names." He sends fifty-two.

J. B. Hart, McLean, N. Y., writes:

"Were we able to canvass thoroughly we should find full seven-eights of the adult part of our people ready to sign the paper. The inhabitants are waking up to the subject of opposing secret societies. We have reason to believe that God is in the work. Let us give him all the praise."

Rev. W. M. Love, Baker, Mo., sends in the names of about twenty-five legal voters and writes:

"Do not take these names as anything like the Anti-masonic strength of this section. They are not a tithe of it."

A. S. Maxwell, Robinson, Ill., sends one hundred and sixty-two names.

The Sabbath School.

Lesson for Feb. 28—The Land Divided.

JOSHUA XVIII. 1–10.

LEADING TEXT.—The lines are fallen to me in pleasant places; yea, I have a goodly heritage.—Ps. xvi. 6.

HOME READINGS.—M. Deut. xii. 1-12; Tu. Josh. xi. 1-20; W. Ps. xxxiii; Th. Deut. xxxiii; F. Ps. cxxxvi; S. Rev. xxi; S. 1 Pet. i. 1-13.

At the time to which this lesson refers the circumstances were these: The tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, had obtained their inheritance on the eastern side of the Jordan. The tribes of Judah and Joseph (that is, Ephriam and the remaining half of Manasseh) had obtained theirs, according to the description given in chapters xv.-xvii., on the western side of the Jordan. But the others, owing either to their preference for the wandering life of shepherds to which they had been so long accustomed, or to their reluctance to enter upon the work which would be needful for the conquest of their possessions, seemed in no haste to claim their portions. Hence Joshua took means to bring them to a sense of duty, and organized a system by which a correct survey of the land might be obtained and each should receive his own territory. As usual with Joshua when he wished to produce a deep impression on the people, he began with a religious service, and brought them face to face with Jehovah. Let us take note of the following things:

THE PLACE.—This was Shiloh, which has been identified by Dr. Robinson with Seilun. It is described (Judges xvi. 19) "as on the north side of Bethel, on the east side of the highway that goeth up from Bethel to Shechem, and on the south of Lebonah," and modern travelers speak of its scanty remains as existing two or three miles east of the main north and south road, and about twelve miles south of Nablous. Its name, which signifies "peace," was probably given to it at this time as a recognition of the fact that God had given the people rest. We do not know on what principle it was selected as the seat of the tabernacle, but may conjecture that it was chosen for one or other or all of the following reasons: It was near the centre of the land. In a former lesson we saw that the valley of Shechem, where the covenant was renewed, was almost exactly in the middle of Palestine, and Shiloh, being only twelve miles south of that locality, was thus easily accessible from all sides, and not too far distant from the extremities of the country. It was, besides, a place of comparative insignificance, and so its selection would not give rise to any such rivalry as would have been caused by the choice as the ecclesiastical centre of the nation of any town of importance. Some suppose that the gathering of the tribes religiously to the centre is the reference of Jacob's prediction (Genesis xlix. 10), but in our view the ordinary Messianic interpretation of that prophecy is preferable.

THE SERVICE.—This was the setting up of the tabernacle of the congregation. When last we heard of it, the sacred tent was pitched at Gilgal; but whether it was moved with the tribes as they went forward with their conquest of the land, or whether it remained at Gilgal, we have no means of knowing. In any case, the fixing of it at Gilgal denoted the end of their wanderings. It was the terminus of their journeyings. Their unsettled life was over. They had reached their heritage. True, indeed, they had not fully subdued all their enemies. They never accomplished that until the days of Solomon, and then the tent was exchanged for the temple; but they had reached the end of their journeyings, and so Shiloh was for long an interesting place in the history of the nation. Here the tabernacle remained all through the days of the Judges and down to the time of Samuel. Here Samuel as a little boy ministered before the Lord in a linen ephod; and here the house of God was until it was removed to Nobunlen for a brief space, when it would appear that it was at Gibeon.

THE EXPOSTULATION.—Joshua took advantage of this interest to administer a faithful and earnest rebuke to the seven tribes who had not yet claimed their inheritance. He said to them (verse 3): "How long are ye slack to go to possess the land which the Lord God of your fathers hath given you?" This slackness may have been sheer sloth, or it may have been cowardice, or it may have been a reluctance to give up the wandering habit which had become a second nature to them. But it was sinful, because it undervalued the blessing which God had bestowed upon them. It did despite to his grace. It evinced ingratitude, and in fact amounted to actual disobedience. Notice here that God's giving does not absolve us from active exertion to take possession of his gift. It is a peculiarity of God's gifts that they stimulate activity. The "slack" do not obtain them. They are bestowed on the diligent and persevering. He gives us an inheritance of holiness only when we stir ourselves up to overcome the evil that is within us. Salvation is of grace, and yet the command is, "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you to will and to do his good pleasure." "The gift of God is eternal life," and yet the command is, "Fight the good fight of faith; lay hold on eternal life." Are there not too many among those to whom this gift is proclaimed who are "slack to go to possess the land which the Lord God hath given them?" "Many wish for larger possessions who do not cultivate and make the best of what they have. Most people's poverty is the effect of their idleness." This is true of spiritual poverty as really as of temporal.

THE SURVEY.—This must have been a work of time, for it was done thoroughly, as is evident from the descriptions which are afterwards given, and that the tribes had men among them who could make such a survey shows that they had attained to greater scientific knowledge than they commonly get credit for. Yet we need not be surprised at their efficiency in this department, for the Egyptians were adepts in the art of land-measuring—(an art, indeed, which the annual inundations of their river rendered absolutely essential to them, if, at least, they wished to save themselves from constant litigation); and so it is perfectly probable that an acquaintance with civil engineering was one of the spoils which the Israelites carried with them when they left their house of bondage.

THE LOT.—This must not be held as sanctioning an indiscriminate and irreverent use of the lot. It was a special case, and it was settled in a special manner. The land was God's, and in this way he determined where each one was to go. In a very real sense for us, too, he has fixed the bounds of our habitations and ordained our lot; and if we but open our eyes, we may discover that "the lines have fallen unto us in pleasant places, and we have received a goodly inheritage."

LESSONS—1. God brings men to Shiloh, that he may set them to work. When the sinner comes to Christ, he enters into "peace" and "rest," and yet he is not suffered to remain idle. We are saved by grace without works, but we are also saved by grace to work, and the great work set before us is the sanctification of our souls and the service of our generation. Through the doing of this work alone we shall enter upon our inheritance. 2. Nothing is so displeasing to God as slackness on our part to go up and possess his gifts. 3. "The heavenly Canaan is described to us in a book—the book of the Scriptures—and there are in it mansions and portions sufficient for all God's spiritual Israel. Christ is our Joshua that divides it to us; on him we must attend, to him we must apply ourselves, for our inheritance of the saints in light." Rubbish.

And such rubbish! Masonry traced back to the Crusades, to Athelstan, to Noah, to Enoch, finally to Adam; John the Baptist a craftsman, and John the Evangelist a Grand Master! Learned disquisitions on the probable connection of Mason Knights, "Brother Hirams," and Knights Templar, who were fabled to have fought together in the Holy Land, against the infidel Turk! Circumstantial accounts of the origin, in the far past, of multitudinous degrees with such grandiloquent titles as nearly to have exhausted the vocabulary of its superlatives—and much more of like value.

Yet this is the stuff of which the standard works of Masonry have been made, down to a very recent period. With such blind guides is it any wonder that blind followers everywhere exist, and that as a rule the great body of Masons know next to nothing of the true history of the fraternity?

We have all been groping in the dark, accepting traditions for truths, fables for facts, until we are wont to think of Masonry, in its present form, as existing away back into and beyond the Middle Ages.

Even those who had emancipated themselves from the traditions of the Grand Mastership of Adam, Enoch and Noah as too silly to be longer tolerated; who regarded the story of the connection of the Saints John with Masonry as wholly apochryphal; who rejected the long string of so-called Scottish Rite degrees as a very modern invention, believed that the three degrees of symbolic Masonry, and probably, also, the Royal Arch, were of great antiquity. When Masonic students, inspired of common sense, brought to the study of Masonry the methods which alone are tolerated in other departments of historical investigation, next to the pretended history of the Scottish Rite degrees, the claimed antiquity of the Royal Arch was the first bit of rubbish to be cleared away, it soon becoming apparent that the degree was manufactured by the so-called Ancients, some time subsequent to their session from the Grand Lodge of England in 1738.

The third degree next fell under suspicion, and proofs have finally accumulated until it can no longer be doubted that "degrees" in Masonry, in the sense in which we use the term, are of modern origin. The third degree was almost certainly concocted by Anderson and Desagulier, and did not come into existence until about the year 1721. This has been shown by Findel and Hughan, and lastly by Lyon in his recently published history of Masonry in Scotland, for a knowledge of the contents of which American readers are great indebted to the reviews of Bro. Jacob Norton, of Boston, published in the New York Dispatch. Oliver also fixes the appearance of the degree at about the same time. He is thus quoted by Bro. Lyon:

"The name of the individual who attached the aphanism of H. A. B. to Freemasonry has never been clearly ascertained, although it may be fairly presumed that Bros. Desagulier and Anderson were prominent parties to it, as the legend was evidently borrowed from certain idle tales taken out of the Jewish Targums, which were published in London in 1715, from a MS. in the University Library at Cambridge, and these two brothers were publicly accused by their seceding contemporaries of manufacturing the degree, which they never denied. . . . The legend of the third degree was intended by its fabrications to be nothing more than an allegory, although when given as a naked and unexplained fact, and recited with all the solemnity of truth, ninety-nine out of every hundred candidates believe it implicitly."

It is now apparent that not long, if at all, prior to the year 1717, Masonry was very simple in its forms with a single ceremonial, that of initiation. Degrees, and most of the traditions which have served as a basis of such of its so-called histories as were not fresh inventions, were added afterwards. None of these traditions have played a more important part in modern Masonry than that of the Saints John. Entering into the ritual in the parallel lines and elsewhere, having lodge dedicated to them, these Saints have, in some jurisdictions, given their name to symbolic Masonry, as in Scotland, where it is termed "St. John's Masonry."

This tradition began to sprout about 1720, and not until just at the beginning of the present century did it attain its full growth, and blossom out into the following, as it appears in Moore's Trestle-Board:

"From the building at the first temple at Jerusalem, to the Babylonish captivity, Freemasons' lodges were dedicated to King Solomon; from thence to the coming of the Messiah they were dedicated to Zerubbabel, the builder of the second temple; and from that time to the final destruction of the temple by Titus, in the reign of Vespasian, they were dedicated to St. John the Baptist; but owing to the many massacres and disorders which attended that memorable event Freemasonry sunk very much into decay; many lodges were entirely broken up, and but few could meet in sufficient numbers to constitute their legality, and at a general meeting of the craft, held in the city of Benjamin, it was observed that the principal reason for the decline of Masonry was the want of a Grand Master to patronize it. They therefore deputed seven of their most eminent members to wait upon St. John the Evangelist, who was at that time Bishop of Ephesus, requesting him to take the office of Grand Master. He returned for answer, that though well stricken in years, (being upwards of ninety,) yet having been in the early part of his life initiated into Masonry he would take upon himself that office. He thereby completed by his learning what the other St. John had completed by his zeal, and thus drew what Freemasons term a line parallel, ever since which Freemasons' lodges in all Christian countries have been dedicated both to St. John the Baptist, and St. John the Evangelist."

Bro. Norton, who has studied, with his usual care, everything to be found bearing on the connection of the names of these saints with the ritural of Masonry, thus epitomizes the matter:

"The truth is, Anderson first began the practise of dedicating lodges to St. John the Baptist, and the Baptist only. Ramsay, in 1735, jumped therefore to the conclusion that the Masons must have been formerly connected with the Templars, from whom they borrowed the Baptist as a patron saint, and this led Ramsay to manufacture Templar degrees, etc. Hutchinson, in 1775, discarded the theory of Masons having derived their patron saint from the Templars, and candidly admitted that lodges are dedicated to the Sts. John on account of their having propagated Christianity. Dunckerly afterward manufactured the symbol of the 'parallel lines,' when he for the first time Masonized the Saints, which Webb afterward copied into his Monitor."

Thus from its being copied into the Monitor of Webb, the greatest ritualist, as well as one of the most successful degree manufacturers American Masonry has ever known, the Saints' days, the dedicating of lodges to the Saints, and made the parallel lines refer to Moses and King Solomon.—Joseph Robins in Voice of Masonry.

The Christian Cynosure.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEB. 18, 1875.

We have made the acquaintance of the new Western Secretary of the American Missionary Association, Rev. James Powell, and are much pleased with him. Educated at Dartmouth and Andover, he is still quite young for a public man, and he takes the helm of the cause of the freedmen here at the West with an ease and vigor which promises well for it.

THE CARPENTER DONATION.

The sub-committee have, this day, (Feb. 13th), had full consultation with the donor respecting the property on Madison Street, Chicago. It is agreed:

1. That Mr. Carpenter will give complete possession of the premises to the National Association when ten thousand, and the fee simple when a further sum of twenty thousand dollars is raised by friends of the cause.

2. We agree to undertake to raise the first sum ($10,000) by the close of our next anniversary at Pittsburgh, June 8th, and the remaining sum, ($20,000) in three years from that time. That is to say, thirty thousand dollars in all. Mr. Carpenter will convey at once by deed of trust, with the above conditions.

3. We agree that the money raised and property donated, shall be controlled, invested, or disbursed by the National Executive Committee, subject to the approval of the National Association.

We have written to Mr. Stoddard for the advice of the Mansfield Convention, and the plan can be modified in minor particulars if approved.

Now, therefore, ye who have been pleading for these years for a Home of the Reform in Chicago, behold a pleasant one within your reach. One hundred subscribers at three hundred dollars each, or three hundred giving cash or interest notes at one hundred each, will make up the whole sum. Give us a "local habitation" with rooms for prayer and counsel; support a good Secretary to give his whole time to putting State Lecturers in the field and seeing them promptly paid. Hail, brethren, what say you? Are the three hundred Spartans ready! Address next week.

REV. THOMAS E. THOMAS.

While we were writing our last week's editorial allusion to this good man, he had already ceased from the living, and the Religious Telescope brings the sad news of his sepulture at Dayton, the scene of his last pastorate. One year younger than myself, his death fills me with mingled emotions. I could write from memory whole paragraphs from his speeches when we were attending abolition meetings together in Ohio; paragraphs, which, whether written or spoken, were seldom equalled or excelled in eloquence or power.

The son of a poor Welsh minister, he told me that, when a little boy, he learned that no person born out of the United States could be President, he wept bitterly. His soul aborred slavery and loathed the lodge; and he never went back on his principles. Yet, after beaming for a time in our van, like the flame-cloud that led Israel in the night, he ceased for some years to breast the storm of battle; and while scouting and scathing Freemasonry as "The godless Ape of the Bride of Christ," he allowed that godless ape to rear her progeny under his communion table, and sit down like Satan among the children of God.

How often during the nation's long agony have I proposed to myself the example of such precious brethren, beloved, and justly, by the friends of reform; and asked, "O Lord, is there not for me, too, a respite and a refuge, when the blast of the terrible ones is a storm against the wall;" but my only answer has been, "He that endureth to the end!"

One of the saintliest pastors of Illinois, who died lately at Elgin, lifted his eyelids already heavy with death, and said: "Tell the brethren I leave my dying testimony against secret societies." "Ah!" said one who long knew and loved him, "How much better were his living testimony!" "But all men have not faith" said the veteran reformer Paul; and

"God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform"

"That no flesh may glory in his presence." Our dear brother Thomas, when last we met in Dayton, seized me by the shoulders, after thirty years' absence, and both of us battered by time. He wept and laughed alternately. He repeated that poem entire, whose refrain was

"When you was Bill and I was Jo:"

and then poured out a volley of reminiscences of the times when we stood together between American principles and American slavery. He led, almost drew me to his house. Well, "I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me." And from "that better country, that is an heavenly," I know that he looks down on our struggles for the land he loved so well; hails our success, and, haply, like Moses and Elijah or Tabor, mingles still in the conflicts of our Saviour with the evils of the world.

THE SMOKE OF THE PIT.

One of the prophetic scenes photographed by the Angel in the Apocalypse sent to John, is a star falling from heaven, opening the bottomless pit, "and the sun and the air were darkened by reason of the smoke of the pit." If this scene is intended to represent the confounding of church and world, truth and falsehood, Christ's worship and Satan's, we incline to think a portion of this fog from the lower world is let up by G. E. Thrall, editor of the Church Union. His article comes to us over his own name in a malignant little Masonic monthly called The Square, which is sent us by a friend from Susquehanna county, Pa.

This editor of a paper seeking to unite Christian churches, begins by assuring the public that he is not a Mason "and never expects to be." He tells us that he has received a book on Masonry by Albert Pike, the notorious guerrilla and ex-rebel, who, born and educated in New England, yet commanded a regiment of Indians at the battle of Pea Ridge to scalp our troops. Mr. Thrall tells his readers that he has longed to know what Masonry meant, and at last he has learned its meaning from this book of Pike. He assures us that he is not puffing the book to increase its sale. He even doubts if the readers of his Church Union could get a copy, as it is published "for Masons exclusively," though the same Masonic paper which contains his article offers it "free of postage" to any one who will send the price. After thus seeking to provoke a desire to purchase the book, by falsely hinting that it is not intended for the general market, but "published for the use of Masons exclusively," Mr. Thrall goes on to give a syllabus of its contents, and, in his own words, to compare and confound the church and the lodge, giving preference to the latter; and to show that, long prior to Christ, Freemasonry had the essential doctrines of the Christian religion. That our readers may judge this false Christian for themselves, we give at large below clippings from the article printed in The Square and signed by "G. E. Thrall, editor of the Church Union." He starts off thus:

"We are not Masons, and never expect to be. The church is our Catherine de Bora and we intend no other alliance. But we have long felt anxious to know what the fraternity meant. We have heard it abused without measure. Some of our exchanges now lying on our table speak of it as the Synagogue of Satan, and we remember the bitterness excited against it in the public mind when Wm. H. Seward first sprung into notice. But that we knew to be all froth."

Well, now, in guerrilla Pike's book he has found the true meaning of Masonry in the old heathen mysteries, and says:

"We have no doubt that by his Spirit the Almighty himself instructed his benighted children by means of the earth, the air and the sky. One thing is certain—there were men in Ancient Egypt and Greece, who knew more of true religion than the proud doctors of Papal Rome," etc.

This was in Egypt and Greece, where "the world by wisdom knew not God, but became vain in their imaginations and so took the devil's counterfeits for God's truth. Hear him further:

"When we bear in mind that there was also symbolized a Liberator and Saviour who should meditate and intercede for the spirit going through its cavern of trial, we may realize how much of consolation was enjoyed by those who never heard of the Son of man."

This we suppose has elevated Egypt to where she now is. In Moses' day she led the nations in intelligence. She has long been "the basest of the kingdoms." And behold how popular liberty, taught by Freemasonry, flourished under the Pharaohs; and see how the holy lodge spurned that wretch, the first Christian Emperor. Mr. Thrall tells us that,

"Ages before a republic was dreamed of, Masonry was writing upon its walls, "Liberty, Equality and Fraternity." While the world was prostrate before the Emperor, Eleusis closed its gates against Nero, and Masonic priests told Constantine that they had no expiation that could clear him from the murder of his wife."

Then see how superior Freemasonry is to Christianity in the toleration and freedom of thought and discussion:

"It has existed in pagan, Jewish, Moslem, and papal countries; some of its members worship the sun and others the Shekinah; some fall before the Crescent and others before the Cross; but it has taught them all to respect and tolerate each other. Holding itself aloof from the separate creeds, it has held fast to the principle broader than any of them," etc.

What a pity the murdered victims of the lodge could not surround this falsifier with their throats cut and tongueless mouths along with the living men who have been mobbed by the minions of Masonry for a respectful utterance of their convictions, and prove to his eyes and ears that he is one of those mercenary Christian liars for the lodge, who sell Christ as Judas did for that "friendship of the world which is enmity with God."

Once more. In what follows he doubtless means Beecher, but is too mean and cowardly to name him in New York where he has friends. And see how he sends the church of Christ to school to the lodge which is to be our refuge when Christianity fails us!

"As we glance back over the history of this institution, so old and yet so strong, so widely spread and yet so mysterious, we cannot but feel that God has been in it for the good of our race, and that even yet he may design to teach us through it some important lessons. If forgetting the history of Sodom and Gomorrah, and the pure teachings of Jesus, the church shall ever get so low as to support its ministers in vice, there will be still an order which will inculcate morality from the very principles of nature."

Where, we ask, is Talmage? Where is Storrs, of Brooklyn, whose venerable sire at Braintree, Mass., assured me that in his youth New England ministers generally regarded Freemasons as "hand-in-hand with the devil!" Will they tolerate such a paper as the Church Union among their people? We shall see.

And now if this writing haply should meet the eye of this Mr. Thrall, with whom we have no personal acquaintance, we respectfully beseech him to look over the paragraphs above from his pen, and ponder for a moment the following questions:

1. Were not those ancient "mysteries" the unfruitful works of darkness" (Eph. v. 11) which Paul commands to disfellowship? and the "idolatry" which he bids Christians to "flee?" (1 Cor. x. 14.) See Macknight on Ephesians.

2. Are not the mysteries of Eleusis which you properly represent as identical with those of the lodge, the ones into which Julian, the apostate, was initiated at the age of twenty; and which he used as a means of destroying the religion of Christ? (Gibbon's Decline and Fall, c. 23.)

3. In the lodges of the United States, which report more than half a million of Freemasons, have you ever heard of one soul convicted of sin or brought to Christ whom you say the lodge symbolizes?

4. While you say the lodge, or "Masonic priests," excluded Constantine for the murder of his wife, are you ignorant that the lodge itself is a sworn system of murder?

5. While you hint that the church may possibly support Mr. Beecher in vice, and then we can turn to the lodge for morality, are you ignorant that the lodge has no law or rule to punish Beecher for adultery with Mrs. Tilton because she is not a Mason's wife?

6. In short, are you not a "blind leader of the blind?" And in sending your readers to the lodge for morality and religion are you not now lying under that terrific sentence: "Cursed be he that putteth the stumbling-block before the blind; and all the people shall say, Amen!" May God enlighten and save both you and them.

A Good Speech for Our Work.

The Religious Telescope of last week has the following stirring letter from Bro. Miller, of Wauseon, Ohio. It presents the claims of our work and the Cynosure for the support of all testifying churches so forcibly that although long we present it entire:

THE CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—I see, in a recent number of the Telescope, some objections to our encouraging the circulation of the Christian Cynosure. It seems to me those objections are very objectionable, 1st, because it is one of the best weeklies in this country; 2d, it is strictly in accordance with our book of discipline; 3d, it is a great assistant in the great and terrible war with secret, oath-bound societies. It goes before, clearing the way, and does much hard work for us that we may the more easily and successfully extend our lines and build up Christian societies at home and abroad. There are many of our ministers and members who read the Cynosure, and who say they could not get along without it. In many places, under various circumstances, it works side by side with the Telescope in all the reforms of the day in church and state. Furthermore, what the Cynosure is doing for us as a church it is doing for sister churches which exclude members of secret societies, and, under God, assists in renovating churches corrupted by the dark orders.

Again: we cannot fail to give the Christian Cynosure a high recommendation if we contemplate the class of persons who patronize it and work in the cause it represents. They are found among the humble, devoted, self-sacrificing, earnest Christian workers of all evangelical denominations, many of whom are learned, refined and intellectual, possessing warm hearts and clear minds, occupying, as they do in many instances, high positions in church and state. With modest pride we might refer to the class of men known the lecture-field. Suffice it to say that the national agent and lecturer, in the person of Rev. J. P. Stoddard, is a worthy and able minister in the Congregational church. When called to this wide field the society which he served as minister and pastor eleven consecutive years refused to allow him to relinquish the pastorate. Seeing that he must go, they employed another minister to serve them as such for the time being.

Mr. Stoddard as national agent and lecturer, has discharged the functions of his high office to the acceptance of the Executive Committee and with good success. He is very careful in his selections of men to be employed as State agents and lecturers. In this critical and important duty he has acted wisely and without a blunder. His corps of chosen men now in the lecture-field were men of position, and, so far as I know, in the enjoyment of pleasant home circles. They have allowed themselves to be called to the front to be sent out as sheep among wolves, to brook the terrible element of Masonic vengeance. These men have proved themselves trustworthy, have rendered good service, and have been successful. The good cause in their hands, under God, has prospered beyond our most sanguine expectations.

This band of noble men are staunch friends of the Cynosure. We can refer, also, to our bishops. At least three of them are good Cynosure men and successful laborers in its cause. Bishop Edwards, a day or two after he reached Baltimore with his family to set up housekeeping in his new home, informed me that as soon as he got his household affairs set to rights he had to start to meet his appointments. He had six conferences to attend in as many weeks, and one lecture on secrecy to deliver after each conference appointment. Since that time he has been across the continent, and of course he has not forgotten the Cynosure and its good cause. Bishop Weaver has engaged to lecture in California, on secretism, when he gets there. We may rest assured that he will weave a web for the Californians that will never wear out. I am glad to see Bishop Dickson, in the Cynosure, recommending and urging the immediate prosecution of a great enterprise which the Executive Committee have in contemplation in Chicago. I have referred to these great and good men as specimens of scores and hundreds of others who are in sympathy with the Cynosure and the good cause it represents.

I beg leave to give one more reference. President Blanchard, of Wheaton College, bought the United Brethren Church History, read it through, gave it a high recommendation, and advised others to do the same. He holds our church, its discipline, and the Telescope in high esteem. He is the editor of the Christian Cynosure, and is one of our best friends. I know we need the sympathy of such men in this our day of trial.

Now, I ask shall we turn the cold shoulder to such friends? In our present course we have a host of such friends. If we discountenance the Cynosure we will wound them all and do ourselves the greatest possible injury and our enemies a great pleasure but a great injury also.

Now suppose we should never speak a good word for the Christian Cynosure or any other paper, or take any other paper published outside of our own publishing house. We would follow the example of the Masons and all other selfish sinners. I remember of reading: "He that watereth shall be watered also himself;" "Let not every man look on his own things, but also on the things of others." It is patent to every Christian that to bless others is to bless ourselves. We must do good to our enemies; and why not to our best friends, such as the Christian Cynosure and others of the same kind? There is a goodly number of our brethren who take the Cynosure, but there are thousands who do not. It is mainly for their sakes that the above is written. I have tried to represent it correctly to them. For that purpose I have referred to the class and character of men who patronize and work for it and the cause it represents. It is conducted by men of extensive experience and information, learned, intelligent, pious, devoted, self-sacrificing Christians. The Christian Cynosure has passed through flood and flames,—once drowned, twice burned. Still it lives, and may it live on to proclaim those truths and principles that shall live when sin is all destroyed.

Now, among the one hundred and forty thousand members of the United Brethren church, can there not be at least one thousand new subscribers raised for the Christian Cynosure? But be sure to take your church paper, the Religious Telescope, first; then, if you have $2.20 left, send to Ezra A. Cook & Co., publishers, No. 13 Wabash avenue, Chicago, Ill., for the Christian Cynosure. JOHN MILLER.

Mr. Carpenter made the following proposition to the Committee: If the Committee raise $20,000 in money he will give the Association the use of building No. 221 W. Madison St., and if they raise the further sum of $60,000 he will give them the fee simple of the property. Mrs. Holden was elected as a member of the Tract Committee. A paper was read relating to Mr. Carpenter's offer of the building. The paper was received by the Committee. It was voted to amend by substituting the word "church for communion table." It was voted that a committee be appointed to make business arrangements regarding the transfer of this property, the amount of money to be raised and the use to which it is to be applied. NOTES.

—The expression "aphanism of H. A. B." in the article on Masonic "Rubbish," page 7, will probably be meaningless, only as quessed out, to many of our readers; and Websters' Unabridged gives no explanation of the terms. "H. A. B." is Masonic for Hiram Abiff. "Aphanism" means a myth, a fabulous story, which in a historical sense is all the legend of the third degree amounts to.

—The friend of "Rev, Septimus Jones" in quoting the obligation of the first degree omits the words "my body" in the penalty, leaving the impression that the tongue is buried in the sea sands. This is evidently an unintentional omission as the author has before given it correctly to us. We insert this correction to prevent misapprehension.

—Our publishers intend, so soon as the publication of Rev. Lebbeus Armstrong's exhibit of Freemasonry is concluded, to begin the publication of the grange ritual in full and from reliable sources. This will be hailed with joy by hundreds of our workers, many of whom have been calling for the facts on the grange, but could get nothing better than the partial expose published nearly two years ago in these columns.

—The Christian Expositor, of Council Bluffs, Iowa, (United Brethren) maintains a stout and honest fight against the members of that denomination, and their organ in Pennsylvania, the Tribune, who would stain the fair record of the U. B. church against the world's evils. The Expositor reports a number of revivals in the churches of Iowa.

—In the article from Rev. W. Post on the first page of the Cynosure of two weeks ago an unfortunate mistake occurred. The second paragraph should read, "It is well understood that the fraternity of secret societies, Freemasonry, is an oath-bound craft arrogating the right to punish even to the most barbarous death any church member or citizen in this Republic who violates its obligations, especially those who reveal."

The Home Circle.

Just as God Leads.

From the German.

Just as God leads me, I would go;
I would not ask to choose my way;
Content with what He will bestow,
Assured He will not let me stray,
So as He leads my path I make,
And step by step I gladly take,
A child in Him confiding.

Just as God leads, I am content;
To rest me calmly in His hands:
That which He has decreed and sent—
That which His will for me commands—
I would that He should all fulfill,
That I should do His gracious will
In living or in dying.

Just as God leads, I will resign;
I trust me to my Father's will;
When reason's rays deceptive shine,
His counsel would I yet fulfill,
That which His love ordained as right,
Before He brought me to the light,
My all to Him resigning.

Just as God leads me, I abide,
In faith, in hope, in suffering true;
His strength is ever by my side—
Can aught my hold on Him undo?
I hold me firm in patience, knowing
That God my life is still bestowing—
The best in kindness sending.

Just as God leads, I onward go,
Out amid thorns and briars seen;
God does not yet His guidance show—
But in the end it shall be seen
How, by a loving Father's will,
Faithful and true, He leads me still.

Likeness to God.

"If men take a pleasure in the resemblance of their children to them, and the satisfaction of a father is increased by observing a similitude between the roots and its branches, and by seeing his own features copied out in his offspring, why should we not conceive in God somewhat near akin to such a remarkable pleasure upon children being born to him after a spiritual manner, in whom his image shall shine and by whom his glorious perfections shall be transcribed and imitated? What a handle of triumph and of holy exaltation will it be to you if God shall not pronounce of you, and such as you, what once he did of his people the Jews: 'I have begotten and brought up children, and they have despised me' [Isa. 1, 2]; but if, instead of any such complaint against you, Christ shall commend and applaud your conduct and invite you to receive the reward of it in those transporting words, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world' [Matt. xxv : 34]. With these and such like considerations, my beloved brethren, we should endeavor to arm and strengthen our virtue against the several assaults of our ghostly enemy. The book of God should be before our eyes, our hands should work the thing which is good, and we should set the Lord always before our thoughts. We should pray without ceasing, and never be weary of well-doing. We should be occupied evermore in some spiritual employment, that in what part soever the tempter shall form his attack against us he may find every pass well guarded, and all the powers of our souls in readines to resist him."—Cyprian.

An easy life is necessarily a useful life.

A Home.

In my visiting, I have found a home. It is not a mere house with a family in it, but a genuine, true, charming ideal home. It is not in the country among the hills, nor is it in one of the favored streets of luxury in the city. It is within a stone's throw of considerable destitution, and it has an outlook that I wish could be bettered. The first thing you will see in the front room is a bunch of dried fern-leaves, elegantly grouped with a few mosses, and fastened on the wall; then a bunch of lichens and a group of leaves. These are exquisite, displaying the art of nature in arrangement. They take the place of chromos or more costly paintings. Oh! you say, how sweet and fresh and tasty; you know what to expect in the mother of this household. And you will not be disappointed. She is not an artist or a scholar—does not understand botany or drawing; she has no advantages which are unusual. She has simply used well what she had. I found that she not only knew how to arrange her house, but how to keep home. Her children were growths of this home. They grew up out of their ideas—thrift, taste, love, order. She had an idea that home was not worth building apart from the family. Its object was to be applied every way to the rearing of young souls. So in all her departments she had studied an adjustment between things and spirits. This was where her babies were to get their first impressions and conceptions, where they were to be moulded and cultured, and made wise and strong for society.

But why do I talk of the mother; the father was the head of the family, and he kept his place. He was firm and unswerving, and the idea of responsibility ran through all he said or did. We knelt in prayer together, and I noted that not only each boy read the Scriptures, but each one prayed. One knelt with his mother, the other with his father. As they knelt they tenderly put their arms around each other; and after the children had prayed, each kissed his parents, looking into each other's eyes with an unaccountable expression of devotion. Throwing open the door of a little nook filled with books and maps and globes, the father said: "This is our wardrobe, walk in." "But I do not see a garment here," I said. "No, but still here are several coats, and dresses, and bonnets; and here," pointing to a cyclopedia, "is a pile of furs. You see we thought like others, that we could not afford books. But we found that we ate up a volume at each meal—that a coat would buy from twenty to forty volumes, and that by a little saving we could indulge here. So, we don't have quite so large a wardrobe for our bodies, but a much larger one for our minds. That room where we knelt in prayer is our worship-room. We use it for nothing else. If one of us wishes to pray, he goes there. If to meditate, and get power to overcome some temptation, that is the retreat. If one of the children has done wrong, he is never allowed to express his repentance first to us, but first in the prayer-room to go to his Father. Do you think it a waste of room? I told him it was the best used room in the house. "So you see," he continued, "in there, the books, pictures, and all associations are to cultivate the spiritual faculties. There we sing together, and pray alone. Here we study or read, and cultivate our intellects."

One evening each week this family gives regularly to such of the neighboring children as care to call. The father and mother with gentle refinement, and with prayerful love, make the evening bright and joyous, but yet thoroughly religious. It is a training-school in which the scholars do not see that they are under discipline. Occasionally some fruit or refreshment is served; always there is talk about manhood and honor and good faith; and talk about God is brought in as naturally and easily as about books. The children get accustomed to coming with their cares, temptations, dangers, and sins to these parents, and so they are led and moulded into a higher life.

I cannot tell you half of what I saw in this house. The charm are, it was all so easily done. There was no marvels, no wonders; nothing that depended on vast wealth or education, or peculiar gifts. Any one could do the same. It was the result of a determination to live usefully, wisely, and godly—to make a home that was essentially beautiful and adapted to the best results. Perhaps I will tell you more another time. I shall certainly call often at No. 10——street.—Sunday-School Times.

A Word to Mothers.

Each mother is a historian. She writes not the histories of empires or of nations on paper, but she writes her own history on the imperishable mind of her child. That tablet and that history will remain indelible when time shall be no more. That history each mother will meet again, and read with eternal joy or unutterable woe in the far ages of eternity. This thought should weigh on the mind of every mother, and render her deeply circumspect and prayerful, and faithful in her solemn work of training up her children for heaven and immortality. The minds of children are very susceptible and easily impressed. A word, a look, a frown may engrave an impression on the mind of a child which no lapse of time can efface or wash out. You walk along the seashore when the tide is out, and you form characters, or write words or names in the smooth white sand which lies spread out so clear and beautiful at your feet, according as your fancy may dictate, but the running tide shall, in a few hours, wash out and efface forever all that you have written. Not so the lines and characters of truth or error which your conduct imprints on the mind of your child. There you write impressions for the eternal good or ill of your child, which neither the floods or storms o earth can wash out, nor death's cold finger can erase, nor the slow moving ages of eternity can obliterate. How careful, then, should each mother be of herself in the treatment of her child. How prayerful, how serious, and how earnest to write the truths of God on his mind—these truths which shall be his guide and teacher when her voice shall be silent in death, and her lips no longer move in prayer in his behalf in commending her dear child to her covenant with God.—Ex.

The Clerical Conscience.

One of our secular weeklies raises the question, "How far may a church society tolerate different action on the part of the pastor from the expressed creeds and doctrines of the church?" or "whether a minister has any right to a change or modification of views upon points of doctrine and discipline, and whether, having experienced such change or modification, it is his duty to honestly state the fact and take the risk of carrying his congregation with him?"

In the Reformed church in America, every one of her ministers is bound by his subscription to the articles of faith, not to teach any contrary doctrine, and if he should experience the change of views he must not publicly proclaim them, but must take them known to the constituted authorities of the church. If after this he remains of the same opinion he is equally bound not to make them public while he continues to be a minister in this church. He may leave it when he pleases for conscience' sake and go where he can exercise his Christian liberty. But he may not preach heresy and distract and divide the church which has called him to proclaim his own system of doctrine. If he does this, he is liable to trial and penalty upon conviction for proclaiming false doctrine, and for disturbing the peace of the church, and for violation of his covenant with it.

The "clerical conscience" has no right to complain of restrictions upon its liberty in such a case. No man has a right deliberately to break his own registered vow of fidelity to the church in which he ministers. He may be honest and conscientious in his change of creed, but is he not also bound a honestly and conscientiously to re spect the rights and privileges those who in good faith placed him i their pulpit? Let him find an area where he can feel at home and expre his views without hindrance. But as a public teacher he is morally and religiously under the highest obligat ns to be true first to his plighted wrd, and then having in proper ways procured his release from his ecclesiaical relation, he may use his liberty ithout hurt to his own conscience to the church in which he can no nger stay. It seems plain to us that n all similar cases "a conscience void f offense toward God and man" n be very easily kept. But the irit o f modern latitudinarianism encurages the distraction of churches by ae open violation of personal subscriptn to articles of faith. And what is his but the depravation of consci en in the very act of asserting its freedm? The moral philosophy of such men is quite as much at fault as their theology. It is not so much a question of liberty of conscience, as it is whether a public teacher of the Christian religion is bound to keep his word.—Intelligencer.

Stray Gatherings.

Reason never shows itself so reasonable as when it ceases to reason about things which are above reason. When Paul was a Pharisee, he thought he was blameless; when he was a Christian, the chief of sinners. Where sin enters, pride will enter too, and supply the place of real honor, and as iniquity aboundeth, pride aboundeth also; else how could sinners boast of dignity, and take up mighty state, on account of verbal titles, or of transient manors, when they themselves must presently be eaten up with worms? Pass by the learned, the mighty, and the wise, for they are dust; but let us reverence the little children; for they are God's messengers to us. Ministers only draw the bow successfully when God's Holy Spirit sharpens the Gospel arrow, and wings it to the hearts of them that hear. It does not require much religion to cry hosannah, hallelujah, or glory to God, or praise the Lord at the top of your voice. Almost any one can do that, and use all the vain repetitions you can, and not have religion. It is the pure in heart who shall see God. A few minutes' devotion at night will not clear the conscience of a foul trick done during the day, nor will going to church on Sunday atone for the wilful sins of a week. Men plant prayers and endeavors, and go next day looking if they have borne graces. Now God does not send graces as he sends light and rain, but they are wrought in us through long days of discipline and growth. Acorns and graces sprout quickly, but grow long before ripening. The only way to find comfort in earthly things is to surrender them, in a faithful carelessness, into the hands of God. He who cares for our eternal salvation, will not forget our temporal wants.

Alphabets and their Variations.

It is both entertaining and instructive to trace the growth of the alphabets of different nations, and the relations which they bear to one another, although the marks of consanguinity are often difficult to detect. We have no positive information of the origin of the first alphabet. The tradition of Cadmus is too mythical to be soberly regarded as the true beginning of written language. That all alphabets have had a common origin seems almost certain; but the connection between the Hebrew and the Roman, or the Hebrew and the irregular, tortuous, and bewildering Chinese characters seems almost as difficult of discovery as the missing links in the decent of man according to the Darwinian theory.

The penmanship of every individual is peculiar, the handwriting of the best penman in different countries differing widely. English, French, Spanish, and Italian penmanship have decided peculiarities, and yet their alphabets are identical. It is often asserted that a man's handwriting gives a true index to his character. The theory certainly has more support if applied to races; for even the less accute can discern some resemblance between the national characteristics of a Chinese—his ingenious, dissembling nature—and those expressionless symbols which baffle the most accomplished linguists. On the other hand, the stern and solemn earnestness of the ancient Israelites is clearly depicted in the stiff, square, and formal Hebrew alphabet. Contrast it with the flowing lines of the Arabic, and then think of Moses and Haroun al Raschid. Prose and poetry are not more different. Why may not ethnological causes have resulted in the strange and multiform signs and marks which go to make up the volume of written tongues?

The style of character called Roman must be of more interest to us than any other, and, therefore, we will briefly refer to a few historical facts concerning some of the variations through which it has passed down to the present time. We are told that if Cicero could "revisit the glimpses of the moon" he would be as well able to read Sanskrit as our modern reproductions of his orations. And why? The form of letter used in his epoch was the capital, which has, indeed, undergone but trifling alteration. What we term lower-case letters were unknown in his time; and not until the business of the Roman merchants increased so rapidly that the slow and tedious method of transcribing cumbersome capitals was inadequate to conduct the correspondence incident to such a volume of trade, did a more cursive or facile handwriting come into vogue. But even this style was varied by every nation that adopted it. Every scribe wrote his own peculiar "fist," and, undoubtedly, there were as wretched penmen in those days as now; therefore after the lapse of years, the original was utterly obscured.

This cursive style was introduced about the fourth century, but such was the predjudice against it among literary men, whose time was not restricted, and that it was almost exclusively confined to the shopkeepers, the "great unwashed," of that age. It was received into general use about the tenth century, and has ever since remained the text letter of the greater part of the civilized world.—Selected.

There is far too little daily and earnest Bible reading. The Scripture reading of many church members is brief, hasty and well-nigh fruitless, and many others have no daily habit of reading the Bible at all. In many Christian (!) families the daily paper crowds God's precious Word entirely out of the morning hour; and in some "tell it not in Gath"—out of the whole Sabbath.

There is nothing that makes a man so able to preach Christ to the people as getting Christ within him.

Children's Corner.

A Boy Habit and What Came of It.

"Lend me a postage stamp, Hal," said Nicholas, as he was folding a letter to send home. "I am out of stamps and change. I will pay you back when my next allowance comes."

Hal handed over the stamp and then went on with his writing. Nicholas mailed his letter and thought no more of the stamp. Hal did not care, so you think there was no harm done. But there is where you make the mistake. He had defrauded his schoolmate out of three cents, and he had added another link to the chain which was fast binding him. Evil habits are so easy to form, but so hard to break up. The next time he borrowed ten cents, "just till to-morrow, when he would get a bill changed." Then he made himself noted in school for borrowing pencils, pens, knives, and such like schoolboy possessions; and several of the most obliging boys had lost considerable by him. At last it grew the custom to decline, when he wished to borrow. But there were generally new boys, coming from time to time, who had to find out his propensities for themselves.

If you had called Nicholas a thief, I suppose he would have repelled the idea with scorn. But he was, for all that. The habit was growing upon him daily. He grew very reckless of the rights of others. He was always borrowing as a boy and as a young man. His acquaintances grew shy of him, and crossed over on the other side, rather than run the risk of being importuned for "a short loan." He obtained a situation in a bank, and in an evil hour was tempted to enter into a speculation, "that would surely make fifty thousand dollars." He "borrowed" twenty thousand from the bank, secretly, intending to return it in the same way, as soon as his fortune was realized. But his scheme failed, and the wretched young man fled to avoid exposure. He was arrested, however, and confined to a felon's cell, leaving a stricken household to the grief and shame with which such an act must overwhelm them. It was the natural end of the habit of borrowing and not returning small sums. Boys, let the strictest honor characterize your dealings, down to the smallest particulars.—Schoolday Magazine.

Two Neighbors and the Hens.

A man in New Jersey told me the following circumstances respecting himself and one of his neighbors:

"I once owned a large flock of hens. I generally kept them shut up. But, one spring, I concluded to let them run in my yard, after I had clipped their wings, so they could not fly. One day, when I came home to dinner, I learned that one of my neighbors had been there full of wrath, to let me know my hens had been in his garden, and that he had killed several of them, and thrown them over in my yard. I was greatly enraged because he had killed my beautiful hens, that I valued so much. I determined, at once, to be revenged, to sue him, or in some way get redress. I sat down and ate my dinner as calmly as I could. By the time I had finished my meal, I became more cool, and thought that perhaps it was not best to fight with my neighbor about hens, and thereby make him my bitter, lasting enemy. I concluded to try another way, being sure that it would be better.

"After dinner I, went to my neighbor's. He was in his garden. I went out, and found him in pursuit of one of my hens with a club, trying to kill it. I accosted him. He turned upon me, his face inflamed with wrath, and broke out in a great fury:—

"'You have abused me. I will kill all your hens, if I can get at them. I never was so abused. My garden is ruined.'

"'I am very sorry for it," said I. 'I did not wish to injure you and now see I made a great mistake in letting out my hens; I ask your forgiveness, and will pay you six times the damage.'

"The man seemed confounded. He did not know what to make of it. He looked up at the sky—then down at the earth—then at his neighbor—then at his club—and then at the poor hen he had been pursuing, and said nothing.

"'Tell me, now,' said I, 'what is the damage, and I will pay you six-fold; and my hens shall trouble you no more. I leave it entirely to you to say what I shall do. I cannot afford to lose the love and good will of my neighbors, and quarrel with them, for hens, or anything else.'

"'I am a great fool,' said he. 'The damage is not worth talking about; and I have more need to compensate you than you me, and to ask your forgiveness than you mine.'"—A Kiss for a Blow.

Prairie Dogs.

They look very much like red squirrels, with their ears cropped close as a hen's, and their tails cut off to three inches long. They live in houses or holes in the ground, and usually in "towns," where large numbers are found. Each family has a house for itself; and such houses! They dig holes in the ground, sometimes quite deep and very crooked; and at the top they make mounds about the size and shape of an inverted bushel basket, leaving a funnel-shaped hole in the middle for the doorway. It is hard to get hold of them, for they always run to the mounds on the first intimation of a person approaching, and if shot they fall into the house out of reach; but if not, they dive down in a very amusing manner. At times they are very playful, and will chase each other around for awhile, then sit up on their hind legs and make a chuckling noise, like laughing, or stand on their hind feet and give a squeaking challenge for another race, and off they go. I have stopped my oxen and sat on the plow to watch them in their antics, and always with increasing pleasure. It took me some time to learn about them for they are hard to get acquainted with. But after awhile they seemed to lose their fear and would play all sorts of pranks when I was within a few feet of them.—Prairie Farmer.

Religious Intelligence.

—The evangelist Hammond went to San Jose, Cal., after the meetings at Galesburg. His wife is assisting in the work and they now are in San Francisco holding successful meetings.

—Rev. D. B. Douglass, of Niagara county, N. Y., whose paralytic shock was reported lately, has been removed to Lockport from Groton, N. Y. There is some hope of his recovery.

—Rev. L. N. Stratton, of the Wesleyan, dedicated a fine new Wesleyan house of worship at Brighton, Mich., on Lord's Day, Jan. 31. Over $800 were raised to complete the payment on the building. Rev. J. H. Canfield is pastor of the new society, which with another Wesleyan brotherhood four miles distant, was formed largely of members who came off from the Methodist Episcopal church of Brighton as a result of the faithful labors and testimony of Rev. John Levington, and soon after he left that place.

—Revivals of more or less interest are reported in the Wesleyan church from pastors Harris, of the Lockport Conference, Rist of Champlain, Waterman, of Michigan, Anderson, of Tomah, Wis., Pinkney, of Wheaton, Ill., A. J. Hiatt and J. T. Horne, of Indiana.

—The United Presbyterian has a notice of the death, on the 1st of this month, of Rev. J. H. Peacock, pastor of the U. P. Church, of Coulterville, whose name is signed to the call for an anti-secret county meeting and organization at Coulterville next Wednesday, Feb. 24th. It is a somewhat remarkable dispensation that has removed five ministers from the Presbytery of southern Illinois in the past two years, and three within six months.

—The Delaware Indians, who number about 1,000 persons, have a Baptist church of 203 members, with a fine house of worship, and a large Sunday-school.

—The Baptists have 41 associations in Illinois, 882 churches, 481 pastors, and 61,816 members. In 1874 they report 4,350 baptisms. There are 33,989 Sunday-school teachers and scholars.

—The plan of union between the regular Presbyterian churches of the Northern States and their brethren of the South, having failed, it will still be interesting to know that the Southern church, through its Representative Committee, is likely to form an organic union with the (Dutch) Reformed church. Committees of the two bodies met in New York about the middle of January, and agreed on the basis of union, which only remains to be ratified by the two Synods. The union embraces the work of publishing, home and foreign mission departments, and education.

—Messrs Moody and Sankey are spending the month of February in Liverpool, Eng. The effect of their visit to Dublin is increasingly important. The revival meetings have been continued and hundreds are seeking salvation.

—A letter from the American Consul at Sheffield, England, to a gentleman in Wheaton, Ill., describes the powerful meetings in that place, and shows the strong ritualistic tendencies of the church of England. The following is an extract: "We have had a time of great religious interest here for a fortnight under the labors of Moody and Sankey. The whole town has been moved. The largest hall, holding more than 3,000, was not one-third large enough. All denominations, church of England included, united in the work. The church of England clergymen, some of them, being among the most earnest workers. An unfortunate incident occurred near the close of the meetings. An overflow meeting was held in the churchyard of the parish church—ten thousand present. There were so many inquirers that the church was opened for them to enter to be dealt with individually. As every one could not be conversed with personally, the Rev. Mr. Stainton, our most earnest Congregational minister, gathered a little group of inquirers and addressed them in the church. The news was immediately telegraphed to a London paper, the Daily News, that a dissenting minister had delivered a discourse in the parish church! This at once aroused the church of England clergy, and a denial was telegraphed to the same paper. There was also an election for Proctor, at York, the next day, and our Sheffield vicar, Canon Hill, was a candidate, and was beaten, much to the indignation of the Sheffield clergy, who withdrew in a body from the assembly, protesting against the ruling of the arch-deacon presiding, who would not allow any questions to be asked of the other candidate, to ascertain his views upon ritualism I suppose. Our vicar, Mr. Hill, is strongly opposed to ritualism. He has been also from the first a co-worker with Moody and Sankey here. But he felt called upon at York in a speech to deny that a dissenting minister had made an address in the parish church.

It commences at the well known "crib" out in the Lake, and extends two miles under the Lake bottom and six under the city to large pumping works in the southwestern district. Twenty large reservoirs are built at different points of the tunnel.

—The Nebraska Legislature has voted $50,000 for the purchase of seed' etc., for the grasshopper sufferers in Nebraska. A Board of Distribution has aeen appointed.——The Circuit Court st Chicago, recently decided that the tecrecy of the ballot was violated by the operation of the State Registry law, which was oppressive, and therefore unconstitutional, in enforcing the numbering of the ballots, which necessitates their exposure.——During the absence of the parents a house in Lyme, Conn., in which were seven children took fire from the explosion of a lamp. The children, the oldest being 17 years, were obliged to flee half-dressed. One of them, a boy eight years old, reached a neighbor's, and was found on the door-steps next morning nearly dead. The others took refuge in a clump of cedars near by, and on Friday morning when help arrived one of them, a girl 13 years old, was frozen dead, and another was so badly frozen that life is despaired of.——A fire at the Shaker settlement at New Lebanon, N. Y., on Saturday, destroyed a mammoth dwelling house, three barns, and a workshop belonging to the church family, all situated together at the fork of the roads. The house was the largest in the settlement, and was built only about five years ago at a cost of $40,000; one of the barns was valued at $10,000, and the total loss cannot be less than $70,000. The house burned was the home of Elder Frederick W. Evans, the apostle of Shakerism, and a family of from 150 to 200 persons.——News has been received in Washington that an attack was recently made by a party of whites—Americans and Mexicans—on the Indians at the Apache Agency; sixty horses were stolen, and several of the Indians were killed. The Indians deserted the agency and hid in the mountains. Squaws sent as messengers to the whites were murdered by them.——In response to a request of colored clergymen, the Bishops of the African Methodist Episcopal church have fixed upon Monday, March 1st, as a day of fasting and prayer, and issued an address to the American people pleading for the enjoyment of every civil and political right, and that they should be permitted to lead quiet and peaceful lives in all godliness and honesty, with ample protection for their brethren in the South from the few bad men that persecute them.——The cold spell of the past two weeks has been very severe all through the northern States. All the railroads north and west of Chicago were more or less obstructed. The rivers at New York were so frozen as to stop the ferries nearly all of one day, and causing a temporary adjournment of the Tilton–Beecher court. Around Belfast, Me., all the harbors are closed with ice. Penobscot Bay is frozen over with ice from three to six inches in thickness, which has happened only once before in over a quarter of a century. —The Bishop of Strasburg having issued a charge to his clergy in which he alleges that the church is persecuted, the German authorities have seized the copies and forbidden the promulgation of the document.——News from Spain says that the military operations of the Alfonsists in the North have been momentarily suspended. The troops are fortifying themselves in the positions which they occupied in their advance. Madrid dispatches state that General Moriones has been appointed Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the North in place of General Laserna, resigned. The Carlist chief Mendiri, was arrested for treason and shot by order of Don Carlos. It is said that the Alfonsists have lost 1,200 killed in the recent engagements.

—Another attempted outrage on the Protestants in Mexico is reported. A body of Catholics attacked a church at Acapulco, but were met by a courageous opposition. The Protestant pastor was, however, compelled to take refuge in an American war vessel, and it is reported that six persons belonging to the Protestant congregation were killed and nine seriously wounded. Five of the attacking party of Catholic Indians were killed and eleven wounded. The Catholic priest, who is alleged to have incited the riot, and fifty of the rioters have been arrested.

Washington.

Congress has been busy in session over the tax bill and out of session on a bill for the settlement of the Southern question. Both are exciting serious comment. The necessities of the extra tax can be easily met by cutting appropriations and salaries.——The opening of an extensive gambling saloon in the late residence of the British Minister, in the very fashionable center of Washington, has been of considerable annoyance to people resident in the locality and not very creditable to the city generally. The Judiciary Committee of the Senate has been instructed to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to suppress this vice.

Home and Health Hints.

Putting Things to Rights.—"The place of a comet," says a writer on domestic topics, "may be accurately calculated after certain perturbing influences have acted upon it, but the locality of a bootjack, when that humble article is wanted, is seldom exactly computed by the masculine brain." The same remark could too often be applied with equal truth to coats, hats, dressing-gowns, slippers, gloves, and articles innumerable in daily use. It would be quite as difficult for the orderly housewife to compute an eclipse as to reckon up the time she spends from one year's end to another in hunting up articles that are out of place, and putting in place things "lying round." Now, through time spent in making home neat, orderly, and inviting cannot be considered as wasted, yet, if the principle of division of labor in putting things to rights were religiously practiced, there is no telling how much valuable time might be saved. It is comparatively an easy thing to have a place for everything, but to keep everything in its place, "ay, there's the rub." Before we know it, hats and caps cover the sewing machine, instead of the hat rack, overcoats lie on the backs of chairs, books are laid on the organ, overshoes ornament the hearth rug; and the mantel piece—what small articles may we not hope to find there? pens, inkstand, small change, vials of medicine, collars and cravats, cuff buttons, letters, bills, and what not rest there in rich profusion and admired disorder. One of the benefits that the mother of sons can confer on her own sex and all the world beside is to form in them the habit of putting things in place. This can be done only by following them round and requiring them when they are through with a library book to put it on the shelf where it belongs; when they take off their overcoats to hang them on the rack; when skates are unstrapped or boots taken off that they be put somewhere else besides on the hearth rug or under foot; when slippers are removed that they at once rest in their appropriate case. The law of habit thus imposed will gradually extend its domain till it includes everything the boy handles or calls his own, and exercises an influence on all he is and does. In a house inhabited by such men and boys, putting things to rights will occupy a very brief daily interval. —N. Y. Tribune.

Keep the Feet Warm.—Many of the colds which people are said to catch, commence at the feet. To keep these extremities warm, therefore, is to effect an insurance against the almost interminable list of disorders which spring out of a "slight cold." First, never be tightly shod. Boots or shoes, when they fit closely, press against the foot, and prevent the free circulation of the bloed. When, on the contrary, they do not embrace the foot too tightly, the blood gets fair play, and the spaces left between the leather and stockings are filled with a comfortable supply of warm air. The second rule is—never sit in damp shoes. It is often imagined, that unless they are positively wet, it is not necessary to change them while the feet are at rest. This is a fallacy; for when the least dampness is absorbed into the sole, it is attracted further to the foot itself by its own heat, and thus perspiration is dangerously checked. Any person may prove this by trying the experiment of neglecting the rule, and his feet will become cold and damp after a few moments, although, taking off the shoe and warming it, it will appear quite dry.

Farm and Garden.

SMALL FARMS.—An observing traveler, passing through Ohio, cannot fail to note two facts that confront him at every mile of his progress through the populous and fast-increasing Commonwealth—the small size of her farms and the thorough manner in which they are cultivated. With all her vast mineral resources and prosperous industrial enterprises, she is yet an agricultural State, with rich and happy farmers. From her Queen City, northward, the traveler passes through a beautiful farming country dotted thick with large, well-built farm houses, splendid barns and overflowing granaries. The average sized farms is now less than one hundred acres. Upon these few acres her farmers put more labor and fertilizers than our Tennessee farmers do upon three times that acreage. The result is, that the same territory there contains over twice the population and wealth. This should not be. Tennessee possesses superior natural advantages. Her people are capable of accomplishing as much, if they but determine to do it. We have too much unproductive land; too many uncultivated farms and too many idle hands in Tennessee. We talk about immigration and wait for some patent process to bring us wealth and capital. While thus waiting with folded hands for outside help, we fail to do for ourselves what we can and ought to do. We have land monopolists who are enlarging their farms, from two to four and ten and even twenty hundred acres. Instead of dividing our farms, multiplying farmers and quadrupling our productions, we are crippling our State by the opposite policy. Small farms and better cultivated lands will bring us population. Population brings us capital; capital infuses life into the State by industrial enterprises and giving labor to mechanics. Well paid and happy laboring men sustain large cities and swell the business of tradesmen. These desirable results follow in the order we have named them. We might as well build a piramid upon its apex as to try to make prosperous cities and populous towns and thriving business men and wealthy manufacturers and independent working men in the midst of sedge fields, and half-cultivated fields and unproductive farms of hundreds of acres.—Knoxville paper.

A lady living in a certain town in Iowa can, it is said, get supper, split kindlings, wash the dishes, milk two cows and feed the hogs while her five boys and two girls are playing a game of croquet.

Temperance.

LONDON LIQUOR TRAFFIC.—London is a world in itself, and it would require a lifetime to know it. There are more than three million human man beings, crowded within an area of about 122 square miles. There are about 6,000 houses where alcoholic liquors are sold, and these places dispense 43,800,000 gallons of ale; 7,800,000 gallons of wine; and 2,000,000 gallons of other strong drinks every year. As a result they have 129,000 paupers and it requires 5,000 lawyers, 2,000 ministers, 3,000 doctors, and 500 undertakers to take care of the criminals, sinners and sick people.

A FORCIBLE COMPARISON.—In Yonkers, N. Y., with a population of 15,000, there are 145 licensed liquor saloons and 70 unlicensed; $37,000 is appropriated to the police; $4,800 for the salary of Judge and Clerk of Police Court; $12,000 are expended by the Commissioners of charities on rum-made paupers, and the total expenses for the last year accruing from the use of liquor were $60,000. In Vineland, N. J., in a population 10,000, where there are no liquor saloons, licensed or unlicensed, and consequently no police court, the appropriation for one constable was $75, and $400 were expended by the overseers of the poor. Cannot the tax-payers see the point?

—The Chicago Tribune has been arguing day after day, to prove that prohibition is a failure, and never accomplishes any good results. But the following fact which it prints relative to the town of Crystal Lake, about forty miles from Chicago, upsets all its theory and shows the weakness of its arguments:

The banner of Crystal Lake is "No License." For the last three years there has been a growing interest in the temperance question, meetings have been held, and the evils of the liquor traffic faithfully portrayed, to large assemblies, and finally decided by a vote not to license saloons. As a result, enterprise in every branch of industry has sprung up, new capital has been invested, fine buildings erected, trade has become more legitimate and profitable, and educational interests held in higher esteem.—Standard.

SOUTHERN TROUBLES.—The N. Y. Witness in an enumeration of the various causes of Southern difficulty has this: Another reason is found in the fact that a great deal of money is spent for whiskey and tobacco. Whiskey eats up more than bread and meat; and tobacco scarcely less. The drunkards of the South are very numerous. There is little public sentiment to oppose the sale or the use of intoxicating liquors. The papers advertise freely, and the drunkards make even more conspicuous the places where liquors are sold. All the idleness that follows in the train of this widespread curse, tends to poverty.

Facts and Figures.

—The total number of locomotive steam-engines in the world is said to be 45,667, of which 14,223, or nearly one-third, are in the United States.

—From a table of the exports of teas from China and Japan to the United States during the past two seasons it appears that the shipments of blacks have increased only from 5,000,000 to 7,000,000 pounds, while those of Japan have increased from 8,000,000 to 17,000,000 pounds, and those of greens from 5,000,000 to 10,000,000.

—Advices from Liberia give evidence of some progress and increased activity; 98,000 coffee trees have been reported to the Government as planted during the last year. During the year the exports amounted to 10,000 gallons palm oil, 100,000 pounds of ginger, 500 pounds of ivory, 54,000 pounds of coffee, 163 casks of sugar or 100,000 pounds.

HOW TO GAIN A DAY.—"If a man were to start from New York Monday noon and travel with the sun around the world, reaching New York again at the end of twenty-four hours, it would then be Tuesday noon. Where did it change from Monday to Tuesday?" We commend to this querist Jules Verne's "Tour of Eighty Days Round the World," and in direct reply to the question remark that as the sun travels over 15 deg. in one hour, in 12 hours he would be 180 deg. from New York, at which point his Tuesday might begin. This would bring the traveler somewhere in Chinese Tartary. Practically this is effected by vessels crossing the Pacific Ocean, making a change in their reckoning according to the way they are going, by either dropping or duplicating a day. The change is made while crossing a parallel of longtitude no part of which goes over land. Twenty-five years ago the question arose in our astronomy class, "Where does New Year's Day begin?" and the answer given, "Somewhere in Central Asia."

MASONRY A WORK OF DARKNESS.

A SERMON BY

REV. LEBBEUS ARMSTRONG.

One distinguished part of the device of the Prince of Darkness, in promoting the institution of Freemasonry, has been to influence Ministers of the Gospel, and members of Christian Churches, to become members of the Fraternity. Various measures have been adopted to accomplish this purpose. Ministers have been told that the knowledge of Masonry would enable them to understand their Bible better, and qualify them for more extensive usefulness to mankind. As a further inducement, the Grand Lodge has decreed, and that decree has been published and practiced in the subordinate Lodges, that Ministers of the Gospel should be entitled to the degrees of Masonry GRATIS. The devices of the Adversary have so well succeeded, that no small proportion of the Ministers of the Gospel have become Masons, and, as a matter of course, many of the members of their respective Churches have followed the example of their pastors. It would be rational to suppose that Ministers, and all professors of Christianity, after taking the first degree of Masonry, in the degrading manner which we have before described, would be convinced that all the light they had received belonged to the Works of Darkness, and that they would have instantly withdrawn themselves from all fellowship with it, and humbled themselves by deep repentance before God, and unreserved confession before men. Some, it is believed, have done this, but others have not. Should the question be asked me, why I permitted myself to take twenty-one degrees of Masonry before I renounced it, I could only answer that such is the indescribable power of Masonic infatuation, that one step into darkness prepares for another, and onward many press, as I foolishly did, in search for light and science, and knowledge and wonders, till Satan, the old infernal Spider, has wound the web of Masonic oaths and penalties, five, ten, fifteen, yes, twenty times and upwards, round them, binding them by the penalty of death, to continue all their life-time, in the fellowship and practice of the Works of Darkness. How deplorable would have been the condition of Masonic Ministers, and all the Masonic members of Christian Churches, thus entangled, had there been no method devised, by which they might lawfully escape the snare of the Adversary, and obey the commandments of God!

Many imbibe the idea, that this is in fact the case; that their Masonic obligations are perpetually and sacredly binding; and that to renounce Freemasonry, would be a crime of perjury. But, if Masonry is a Work of Darkness, how can men be bound by its obligations, when God commands them to renounce it? The obligations themselves belong to the Works of Darkness, and to repent of the sin of taking Masonic oaths, and to break them instantly, is the import of the divine command, when God says, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness." A determination to adhere to Masonic obligations, is in effect, to proclaim open war with God and heaven, to set at nought the counsels of Jehovah, and pursue the road to destruction.

How perfectly absurd is the idea, that Ministers of the Gospel, and professors of Christianity, who are entangled in the works of darkness, should be bound by oath under penalty of death, to continue in their sinful abominations during life! The amount is, we have sworn to serve Satan forever, and the oath must be performed. What can be more preposterous? It is clearly proved that the oaths of Masonry are unlawful and wicked, and that to adhere to them will lead men to destruction. It is the doctrine of common sense, that unlawful oaths are not binding. If a man takes an unlawful oath, he is bound by the authority of Heaven to repent of that act, to break that oath, to humble himself before God, and seek for pardon. This is Bible doctrine. This is common sense. Were the forty men of old, bound to murder St. Paul, because they had rashly sworn to do it, on penalty of death, in case of failure? And would they have perjured themselves, had they repented and publicly renounced their wicked oath? Was Herod bound to take the life of John the Baptist, because he had sworn to grant the request of a giddy young girl? Suppose a man should rashly swear in the morning that he would kill his neighbore sunset, would he be bound to keep and perform that oath? Or would it be his duty to break the oath, and repent of the wickedness of malicious swearing to perpetrate the most horrid crime? Or suppose a man should be decoyed to take an oath of partnership with a company thus bound by an oath of confederacy, and it should turn out that they were a band of highway robbers; would this man be bound by his oath, to rob mails, pick pockets, break open houses, and plunder for gain, at the risk of life and expense of blood, because he had sworn thus to do? Or would it be his duty to break the oath which bound him to perform such nocturnal depredations, in violation of all laws, human or divine, and to repent, forsake, and expose the wickedness of the combination? Who can hesitate a moment in deciding each of the above cases against the binding force of the oaths to commit unlawful acts? Every such oath is wicked, and ought to be broken; and such are the obligations of Masonry. Every Mason is, hence, sacredly bound by the authority of Heaven, to renounce all his oaths of allegiance to the institution of Freemasonry, because they bind to the performance of things unlawful in their nature, absurd and ridiculous in their observance and destructive in their consequences.

With such contamination, the Churches of our Lord Jesus Christ are polluted. Many Ministers are Masons, and refuse to hear the admonitions and reproof of Heaven. Many of their members follow their example. Doubtless Satan triumphs in such fidelity to the cause. A Minister of the Gospel, who renounces Masonry, can scarcely find the door of a Church open to his labors, among some denominations, for the reason that there are so many adherents to Masonry in the Church. Many Ministers, who are not Masons, dare not unite in the fellowship of a seceding brother, for fear of offending some of their Masonic hearers and supporters. General A, Colonel B, Doctor C, Esquire D, Lawyers E and F, Merchants G and H, and other great men down to X, Y, and Z, are Masons. Every eye is upon the Minister. The least word or deed that might be construed against Masonry, will ensure the pastor, what is termed by some, a "WALKING PAPER," that is, some complaint must be preferred against him, and he must be dismissed, (in disgrace if possible), from his congregation. Such is the influence of Masonry in the Church. Satan has planted his infernal standard in the center. Many a Church door is tyled with a drawn sword of Masonic power. The ordinances of God are contaminated with the spirit of Masonic vengeance. Many will profess to lament that it is so, and express a wish that it were otherwise. But under the Banner of the Works of Darkness, who will dare to face the enemy, and boldly testify the Truth of God? Not he who is a Mason, and holds to the binding force of its obligations; nor he who is awed to silence by Masonic influence. Such watchmen will have fellowship with the Works of Darkness, when God commands them to renounce, to separate, reprove, and touch not the unclean thing. O when shall the sons of Levi be purified from the defiling powers of darkness! When shall the Church be purged from the abominations of Masonry! On review of the foregoing subject, we remark,

2. THAT IT IS THE DUTY OF THE MINISTERS OF RELIGION TO PREACH AGAINST THE ATROCIOUS NATURE OF THE INSTITUTION OF FREEMASONRY, WITH THE SAME PLAINNESS AND ENERGY THAT THEY ARE REQUIRED TO USE IN PREACHING AGAINST SABBATH-BREAKING, PROFANITY, INTEMPERANCE, OR ANY OTHER GROSS IMMORALITY.

One essential characteristic of God's faithful Ministers in all ages of the world, has been to sound an alarm when danger appeared; to point out in detail, the prevailing sins of the times; and plainly warn and admonish the people to repentance and reformation. Those who failed to do this, forfeited the title of their commission, incurred the displeasure of God, and were held accountable for the guilt and blood of lost souls. Freemasonry, the once pretended "HANDMAID OF RELIGION," has proved to be, in reality, a Work of Darkness. And it may, with propriety, be termed Satan's Grand Master-Piece, the very Cap of the Climax, of all his stratagems to accomplish the work of destruction. Perversion of God's Holy Word; a blasphemous use of his great Name; a profanation of sacred and holy things; the subversion of justice; abominable imposture, perjury, and blood and murder are found in its skirts. Can the Ministers of the holy religion of Jesus be justified then, in the practice of passing over, in total silence, the enormities of prevailing Freemasonry, which threaten destruction of all that is dear in life, hopeful in death, and blissful in eternity? Can they be justified, it is asked, on the ground of being Masons themselves? Not, indeed, as long as the words, "Have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," stand written in the Book of God. Can they be justified in such neglect, for fear of offending some of their Masonic hearers and supporters, or THEIR friends? As well might they connive at Sabbath-breaking, profanity, drunkenness, theft, falsehood, infidelity, and all other abominable wickedness, for fear of offending some of their immoral hearers and supporters, or THEIR connections. O how can the watchmen on the walls of Zion, clear their skirts from the blood of souls, while, for the love of praise, or to preserve a false peace, or for fear of losing some of their friends, and a portion of their salary, they shut their eyes and ears, and put a seal on their lips, by the plea, "We know nothing about Masonry, and prudence leads us to say nothing about it;" or "We are members of the institution ourselves, and will never violate its most sacred obligations." Surely such ministerial fidelity to the bloodstained institution of Freemasonry, must be the result of "DARKNESS VISIBLE," as Milton describes it; yes, darkness incomprehensible, issuing from the smoke of the bottomless pit.

In view of such considerations, I feel it to be my indispensible duty, arising from a sense of my own shameful experience of the knowledge of Masonry, to entreat my brethren in the holy ministry, and add to my entreaty a solemn warning, especially to those who are Masons, to renounce, come out, and be separate from Masonic abominations. All others I would entreat and beseech to lift up their voice, and be not afraid, but testify publicly and privately, against the Works of Darkness. If Masonic members of Churches will cleave to Masonry, and falsely deny the enormities of its nature, exclude them from the communion of the Church, that the Sanctuary may be purified from the foul contamination. Yes, I would entreat and beseech the judicatories of the Church, of all denominations of Christians, to unite their wisdom, their talents, and pious efforts, to withstand, suppress, and root out this formidable enemy of righteousness, with all its combined and complicated powers of deception, until it is exterminated from our land, and banished from the world. If Ministers have been instrumental in promoting its popularity, let Ministers humble themselves to be more instrumental in promoting its overthrow. Though it may cost them their good name, the hatred and opposition of Satan, the contempt and persecution of wicked men, and the VENGEANCE of Masons, yet God will not fail to reward them with his promised blessing. And as a seal of the testimony which I have borne, and now bear, against the institution of Freemasonry, I do now most solemnly protest against, and totally disavow, the prevailing usage of those Churches of all denominations of professing Christians, who consider it no breach of Gospel rule, to hold in their connection and fellowship the avowed adherents of an institution which belongs to the Works of Darkness, firmly believing it to be my duty to renounce the fellowship of all professing Christians who denominate themselves Freemasons, who knowingly and sentimentally avow the usages, and professedly hold in sacred veneration the binding force and virtue of the obligations of Speculative Freemasonry.

3. IF THE INSTITUTION OF FREEMASONRY BELONGS TO THE WORKS OF DARKNESS, THEN OUR CIVIL INSTITUTIONS ARE IN JEOPARDY.

The light of Truth has disclosed the long concealed fact, that one of the principal objects of the institution of Freemasonry, is to secure the posts of office, the seats of honor, the ensigns of power, with all their emoluments, and thus sway the energies of Civil Government. To secure this march to the summit of elevation, is the clause in the oath of the Royal Arch degree, and which, it is well known, has been introduced in some Lodges, as a part of the MASTER MASON'S OBLIGATION:

"I promise and swear that I will vote for a brother or companion Mason, and promote his election to office, in preference to any other candidate of equal qualification."

It is on this principle, and this only, that it can now be accounted for, that about two thirds, if not three fourths, of all the officers of our civil, military, and municipal departments of government have been filled with Masons. Even from the responsible trust of the Presidential Chair, to the most inferior town office throughout our wide-spread Republic, a MAJORITY of Masons, it is believed, still bear rule; and Masonry, (with other things designated by Agur of old), will never say, "IT IS ENOUGH," as long as there is an office within the bounds of the nation, which is not filled with a Mason.

Secret Societies are always dangerous to Civil Government; and none is in greater danger than a Republican form of government. Its offices being filled by the elective franchise, public and individual rights can be secured only by the suffrage of a free people. But the whole body politic can not be free and independent so long as a part of the community are combined under oath of secrecy and under circumstances to arrogate to themselves the power of confederate influence, to promote each other's elevation to office, honor, wealth, and power, in prefrence to members of the other part of community, who are acknowledged to possess equal qualifications. This is precisely the advantage, which Freemasons, under the mask of charity and good-will to man, have exercised over the rest of community. By this advantage, it has evidently been their aim to secure the exclusive right of office, emolument and government. And ere the Commonwealth was apprised of the imposture, or discovered omens of danger, the chains of Masonic despotism were forging, and preparations fast making to bind the nation in its power.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issued by him, purporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationalist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—'The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The author belonged to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughout the country forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he hore tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is supposed by many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acquainted with Mr. Greene, and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y.,, and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—"The Storm Gathering;" "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

The "Cynosure."

On Thursday, the 7th of May, 1868, in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, at the First National Christian Convention opposed to secret societies, the following resolution was presented and referred to the Executive Committee:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of this Convention that we need a paper, promptly started, ably edited and widely circulated, which shall make opposition to secret societies a speciality."

In June, the following report of the Executive Committee was prepared, and on the 25th of July the first copy of the Christian Banner appeared with the following address:

The Executive Committee of the National Association of Christians, opposed to Secret Societies,

To the members of the late Aurora and Pittsburgh Conventions and to all Christians in sympathy with the object of said Conventions:

BRETHREN:—We have considered the proposition adopted at Pittsburgh for a paper to be devoted especially to relieving the church and country of the secret orders which are perverting and undermining both. Following are some reasons in favor of such a paper:

1. Each of all existing papers has a speciality of its own, and cannot attend properly to this [viz, opposition to secret societies.]

2. As the secret orders cannot endure free discussion they will not allow it where they can prevent it; and hence most existing papers are in danger of being damaged by them if they open their columns to a full and thorough discussion of these orders, such as is given to other subjects, and such as is demanded by their prevalence and importance.

3. Large and intelligent bodies of Christians, such as the United Presbyterians, United Brethren, Free and Wesleyan Methodists, etc., have always made membership in such orders a cause of discipline, and several State conventions and associations of Congregationalists have adopted stringent resolutions against them, while other national church organizations fraternize with and protect these secret orders by their silent countenance or open co-operation. The result and working of this state of things will be to damage the denominations and individuals opposed to secrecy, by universal opposition, and to praise and build up those that are willing to fellowship secret orders. A common organ is therefore an absolute necessity to the denominations and individuals opposed to those orders, through which they may hear from and be strengthened by each other; to encourage and assist existing denominational papers, by helping them to facts and arguments; to aid and represent local and national conventions; and, generally, to further the views, diffuse the principles, and help to carry out the measures of the "National Association."

Resolved, that we take measures at once to start a paper to be called The Christian Banner, Opposed to Secret Societies, to be issued for the present once in two weeks, at one dollar per year, as a four-page six column paper.

(Signed,) J. Blanchard, D. Berger, I. A. Hart, Philo Carpenter, Jos. Haven, J. Travis, H. Kingsley, L. N. Stratton, Ezra A. Cook, Benj. Hackney, N. Brown, A. M. Milligan, J. T. Cooper.

Chicago, June, 1868.

The benedictions of Pres. Finney, Leonard Bacon, D. D., Prof. Joseph Haven, Pres. J. B. Walker, Bishop Edwards and Roberts and multitudes of other Christian people rested upon it. The next issue of the paper which appeared with the name The Christian Cynosure contained the following explanation:

"Our name, The Christian Banner, was proposed to our Committee at the heel of a business meeting and adopted at once, without stopping to recollect that the American Tract Society had given the same name to their monthly. To avoid confusion and seeming unfairness, we change it to THE CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE.

"The paper was now fairly started without any capital but faith in God, the best surest of all kinds, and with help from friends of the cause and subscriptions was issued once in two weeks by the Executive Committee for three years; steadily increasing in value and in patronage. The receipts from the subscriptions did not pay the expenses of the paper notwithstanding the fact that President Blanchard received no salary for his services. There was a desire expressed by many friends that the paper should contain more general and family reading, and the committee at length decided to issue the Cynosure weekly. It was designed to publish in the weekly edition "only about as much on secret societies as the fortnightly Cynosure contained and devote one-half its space and strength to whatever else a Christian ought to know."

The first copy of the weekly Cynosure was issued September 7th, 1871 and in the next month, October 9th, the CYNOSURE mail list, press, new type, etc., were all lost in the great fire which destroyed a large part of Chicago. $675.78 were contributed by earnest friends to aid in starting the paper again and the first issue after the great fire was dated October 17th, 1871. The CYNOSURE mail list slowly recovered its lost names and the paper has been printed with almost no intermission since, although one year later, "fire, flood (from fire men's hose) and frost" retarded its progress.

The fortnightly edition was discontinued April 1st, 1874 and the paper is now issued weekly in a more convenient form and much enlarged in size. It is acknowledged by all friends to be a fundamental element of strength in this reform.

Postage on the Cynosure.

THE POSTAGE ON THE CYNOSURE MUST BE PAID AT CHICAGO. It is twenty cents a year.

The cost of postage now depends entirely on the size and weight, and therefore some smaller papers charge but fifteen cents; and others about the size of the Cynosure charge twenty-five cents a year for postage.

If the subscription price of the CYNOSURE was $2.50 or $3.00 a year, the price of many religious papers containing no more reading matter, we might afford to pay the postage ourselves, but at $2.00 a year we cannot do this with our present Subscription list.

Therefore let all send the postage, 20 cents a year, 10 cents for half a year with their renewals.

The commission on one new subscription for a year will pay the postage on your own and the new subscriber's paper. We would rather have the postage paid by commissions than in any other way.

When postage is not paid we shall have to shorten the time of subscription sufficiently to pay it.

Topics of the Time.

Columns might be filled with stories of the severity of the winter season, now, let us hope, wholly passed. The effect on the high seas is nearly as severe as on land, hence the action of the English government in postponing their Polar Expedition until next year on account of the unusual amount of ice in the North Atlantic. Careful observers estimate that a great part, or the whole of the first season would be used in getting through to locations reached directly in ordinary years. The numerous speculations on the glacial period, the changing inclination of the poles, or a transposition in the earth's orbit may all be very well. Practical people will do best in using generous means to keep the frost from their own, and the homes of their poor neighbors. Lessons of charity are of more use, as the world now is, than the speculations in astronomy or meteorology.

The National Grange lately held in Charleston, S. C., deserves to be mentioned for at least two resolutions. The first recommends Government aid in completing the Texas Pacific railroad, the other opposes the tax on tobacco. As for the first scheme the good sense of the Senate committee has effectually quashed Col. Tom Scott's hopes for the present. What he may be able to do with representatives of another party time will show. For the present the project of trailing one hundred and twenty-five millions of the people's money through the sand plains of Texas and New Mexico is not considered feasible, except by the members of the National Grange, Mr. Scott and the managers of the Pennsylvania railroad who would like to handle the money, and a number of Southern politicians, who wish to see it expended for the benefit of their districts. As an advocate of cheap tobacco the grange might be a success. As an efficient ally of the farmer it has not been. Let the "weed" be adopted as the symbol of the order, as the shamrock is of Ireland. Let that convenient receptacle, the fawn-skin pouch, be provided with the best "cavendish," and let the order break down that railroad monopoly, the smoking-car, by introducing a universal use of tobacco.

Will the panic of 1873 elect a President in 1876? Political tyros may figure on such data as these: The financial blow falling first on the commercial center of the nation sent quick vibrations all through the land, and of course fell heaviest at length on the producing classes and men of moderate means, who naturally associated their losses more or less with the management of the leading political party. The Democratic successes of last November were the result. Another factor is the economy enforced among the wealthier classes, which has resulted in an unwonted reduction in the imports of foreign goods and dainties. So great as to seriously impair the revenue, and for the last months of 1874 reduce the national income below a rate sufficient to pay interest on its debt. The Republican majority, recognizing this evil case and acting on the recommendation of the President's message, after laboring with little purpose to reduce the enormous appropriations asked by the Departments, finally drew up the Tax bill over which Congress is now worrying. The features of the bill are partly good, partly odious, but its general effect will be to put the per-cent raised from consumers into the pockets of the manufacturers and not into the Treasury of the United States. The Democrats in Congress are a unit against the bill, for they are "poor man's friend" for political reasons. The longer the bill is discussed the plainer do the Republicans see in it reaction against them, and their tactics seem now to be put off action on this and other important measures so that a special session will be needed. They have but a week more of time to kill. The benefits they hope to reap from an extra session are suggested by the rampage of Brown of Kentucky, the damage of whose capers the Democratic party have had to pay. In the next House of Representatives that party will be a majority, and with more Southern members than Northern, among whom there may be several John Young Browns. The political effect such a House will be apt to make will be tremenduous. Hence legislation lags; the nation groans with debt and mismanagement; and Congressmen look wise and try to save the country with chicanery.

Letter of Dr. Humphrey to the Amherst Students.

PITTSFIELD, July 26, 1849.

GENTLEMEN:—I embrace the earliest leisure hour to acknowledge your favor of the 18th inst., and briefly to give you my views on the subject which you propose. You wished to know "what I think of the influence of secret societies in colleges." I must frankly say, that my experience and observation has constrained me to regard them as injurious rather than beneficial to those institutions and to the members of such societies. But as they have long existed in our older colleges, and still have earnest and able advocates, they are entitled to a candid hearing, and I cannot think of any shorter or fairer way of coming to a right decision, than by considering the advantages and disadvantages of those college secret societies.

I have no question that societies among students, when properly organized and judiciously managed, are highly beneficial and ought by all means to be encouraged. The only question with me is, should any of them be secret societies; that is, societies organized under constitutions and by-laws, which are to be known only to the members under oaths or solemn promises not to divulge any of their doings or regulations to the uninitiated?

What are the advantages to be gained in a public institution by the existence and influence of such societies? This, if I rightly judge, is the first question. If their influence is good and only good, or if they do more good than harm, then they ought to be continued; but if their influence is found upon the whole, to be decidedly injurious to the harmony and good fellowship of the students as a community, then they ought to be disbanded.

What good then do secret societies do in college? I confess, that though I belonged to one or more of them when I was an undergraduate, I have yet to learn.

In the first place, I hold it to be impossible to keep the secrets of any society in college, according to the letter and intent of the initiative promise. They will leak out in one way or another. Even the terrible oaths of Freemasonry could not keep them. The mysterious symbols and signs of the fraternity were almost as well known before the disclosures of seceding Masons as after.

In the second place, if the secrets of college societies could be kept, as profoundly as those of the grave, what advantage would be gained by it which cannot be enjoyed without them? I take it for granted that the avowed and legitimate object of these organizations is mutual improvement, and if there is nothing wrong in their rules and proceedings, if they violate no moral principle, if they be such, as if known, the best of men would approve, what need of any secrecy? Why cannot the members speak as well, and write as well, and debate as well, without the padlock as with it? One would think they might even better. How much does it add to a man's genious, or literary taste, or acumen, to go into a lodge-room, and deliver himself under the solemn injunction of profound secrecy? I confess that is all a mystery to me, if there is anything in it.

What then is the advantage? Is there any? I know there is a feeling among some talented young men, that by associating together, shutting themselves up under lock and key, and pledging their sacred honor not to disclose anything, they add something to their dignity and consequence. They raise themselves above their unitiated fellow students. They think by keeping dark, they somehow maintain a higher standing than they would in the common sunlight of college. But they deceive themselves; it is all imagination, and they are convinced of it, with very few exceptions, in less than half a dozen years after they graduate. They wonder how they could have attached so much importance their secret societies.

But if there are no valid arguments in favor of secret societies, are there any that can be fairly urged against them? I think there are. I think they are exceedingly detrimental to the best interests of our public seminaries. And if I could not show how, or why, I should be compelled by my own observation during a series of years, to regard them as highly injurious.

In this I agree with all college officers with whom I have conversed, and with very many students of the highest standing and character. Nay, I appeal confidently, young gentlemen, to yourselves, whether you have not witnessed the sad effects in the envyings, jealousies and alienations which spring up from this bitter root, even among Christian brethren? I venture to say, that in some of our colleges, however it may be in others, there is no one thing which gives the faculty so much trouble, and produces such bitter heart-burnings among students, as these secret societies. There the facts are. Whatever might become of arguments, they cannot be gain-said or explained away.

But there is no difficulty, I take it, in showing how these secret societies are so hostile to peace and good fellowship in the institutions where they exist. Secret societies can, if they are disposed, adopt rules, and introduce exercises subversive of the great principles of morality and religion, and injurious to themselves. Whether they will or not depends upon the character of the majority of the members, and as all their doings are in secret conclave, there is a strong temptation to overstep the bounds of propriety, which they would repel at once, if they did not act under the pledge of secrecy. It is dangerous for young men, it is dangerous for men of any age to associate themselves together and hide themselves from public responsibility, under the cover of secret articles and promises. The whole history of such associations proves that the tendency is to evil and not to good.

I do not doubt that there may be many excellent and some truly religious young men in secret societies, but I am afraid, to use the language of Paul in a different case, "They are all suffering harm and loss." I could not conscientiously advise any pious young man to become a member of one of these societies. I go further, and give it as my deliberate judgment, that it would prevent much evil and be a great gain, if all these secret societies in our colleges were dissolved.

With best regards to those whom you represent, I am, gentlemen, very truly yours, H. Humphrey.

Gerrit Smith.

Abstract of a lecture before the Chicago Athenaeum by Hon. Z. Eastman on the life and labors of the great Reformer.

No apology is needed for calling an audience together on the occcasion of the death of such a man as Gerrit Smith, for an hour's earnest thought upon the lessons of such a life as he lived. But some reasons for so doing are appropriate and in order. Among these reasons are: that a prominent and good man has died; and not so much for his sake as for our own, it is a duty to take a review of his life while the sense of his loss is fresh in our minds. It is profitable to keep in remembrance the lives of good men. We can add much to the influence of their lives by keeping their deeds fresh in memory, and so prolong their good effect. And this is a public duty. I consider Gerrit Smith to be just such a character whose life it would be specially profitable just now to review. He stands prominently out as a philanthropist and statesman. Such men are greatly needed. We want samples of them for the imitation of our young men. Indeed, Gerrit Smith is almost the only great philanthropist our country has ever produced. This is more nearly true, on careful inspection, than it first seems without much thought.

Gerrit Smith was born in Utica, in the State of New York, on the 6th of March, 1797. He came to the end of that long life in New York on Monday, the 28th day of December last. It was a fitting close for the life of such a man.

In the center of New York was the home and sphere of his childhood. He grew up with the State. He was the son of Peter Smith. Indians were a part of the inhabitants. The forests and swamps furnished animals that grew fur, which men sought for. His father was an Indian trader and fur dealer; for a time a partner of John Jacob Astor. Land titles in the early days were much confused. The State sold vast tracts of land for taxes, and Peter Smith became a large buyer of land from tax sales. This was the foundation of the large estate which the son finally worked up into an available fortune.

Gerrit Smith was familiar with the primitive life of the log cabin and the cultivated life of the parlor. His familiarity with frontier life, and growing up with the growth of that populous section of the country, gave him great advantages for becoming the great, far-seeing and practical man he proved to be. He graduated at Hamilton College at the age of 21. He studied for the law, but abandoned the profession to take charge of the large inheritance he received from his father.

He appears first as a Christian, as he early made a Christian profession. I have said he was a Calvinist, and so he was a Calvinist of the "strictest sect," as John Brown was, and William Lloyd Garrison was at that day, and Wendell Phillips, and many others who afterward became Abolitionists. That rigid faith has made too many men of character in the world, even from John Knox and Cromwell to John Brown, to be profitably sneered at. His first public zeal was an effort, in which Garrison was also an earnest laborer, before either of them thought much of the slave, to save the Sabbath, as he thought, from degradation by the transportation of the mail on Sunday. Whether right or wrong, the country has accepted of the result, and neither Smith nor Garrison has controverted the decision. He was a young man when the broke out in his own State. The murder of an American citizen by an institution that had placed itself outside of the laws of the country, for disclosing the character of that institution, filled him with indignation and alarm for the sacred right of citizenship; and with such men as Seward, Weed, Myron Holly John Quincy Adams, William Wirt, Thaddeus Stevens, and Horace Greeley, he combined to act politically for the vindication of William Morgan and the sacred right of the citizen to the protection of the laws of the country. His efforts in that direction earned him the popular sneer, as was usual at the time and too long indulged in, and which has been no credit to the public spirit of the country.

In his early life there was a conviction of the wrongfulness of slavery; and at that time anti-slavery men were colonizationists. So at the time was Garrison, Tappan, and almost all men who had a conscience upon the subject. Its shallow pretense of being the remedy for slavery was not detected; neither was it known that the slaveholder would capture it, and hold it as a safty-valve to let off all earnest efforts against slavery. Gerrit Smith was a liberal supporter of the colonization scheme—had pledged money for its support. The abolition agitation broke out in 1830 by the imprisonment of Garrison by a slave-trader in Baltimore. It soon became an issue against the Colonization Society. The discussion was carried to Central New York. Mobs had been everywhere sent by the politicians and demagogues to howl upon the track of the abolitionists; to persecute them with the formidable missiles of bad eggs and the like. Their great crime was that they were going to make a man of a negro. There has been no such outcry of making a man of a monkey. If it can be done, we say let it be done; the more men the better, and the world can well spare the monkeys. The abolitionists, the colonizationists, and the mob came together at Utica. There was also there a politician of the popular school, a Democrat, of course, and he was a colonizationist; and as the party got worsted in the debate, Sam Beardsley headed the mob to clinch the argument of the colonizationists against the abolitionists. This was in 1835. The time is known as the Utica mobs. Gerrit Smith said, from the standpoint of a spectator, there was no doubt on which side the devil was in that contest, and Gerrit Smith said he always meant to take sides against the devil. From that day he was an abolitionist so long as there was a wrong he could get at to abolish.

The recital of Gerrit Smith's connection with the anti-slavery movement is almost a narrative of that most thrilling episode in our nation's history. As first advocated by Lundy, Garrison, Goodell, Leavitt, and all others, it was a moral movement, and appealed to the conscience of the slaveholder and the best sense of the American people, in time to put the evil away. It was no less offensive in that mild form of persuasion, then in any other phrase it assumed after. But the large number of the agitators soon saw that it was a political question whether they would have it so or not. Some one has well explained the reason of it, in that the American is a voting animal. You cannot get him to do much in a public way, to correct abuses, unless he can do it by voting. The first drift of nine-tenths of the abolitionists was to vote with one or the other of the great parties, which would best serve the anti-slavery cause. Garrison, the early advocate of the moral movement, foresaw that such a policy would not work, and that these parties would swallow and digest the conscientious voters, as an anaconda would mice. But the essential obstacle toward success with political action with the Whig or Democratic parties was that slaveholders had a hundred to one more voters to be put into the opposite scale; and above all liberty was an essential doctrine in our politics and that is why a Liberty party was necessary.

The first discord with the abolitionists was in the National Convention or anniversary of the society in New York which should decide the political policy in which Garrison and his friends came on from Boston, it was said, with a steamboat load of constituents in men and women, captured the shell of the organization, the owners of the organ, the Emancipator, of which Tappan was prominent, taking that newspaper away with them, to carry the question of anti slavery into politics. Some think here is where a calamity began in the management of the anti-slavery cause that ended in war. But people should understand that all the calamity that ever came of this subject in political action, came from the demagogues of the North, who, for the purpose of uniting the slaveholder's votes on one side, made a monster-man of-straw of this abolition question, and always falsified it before the South and the country; whereas, it was the only statesmanlike way of curing the evil.

On the not-voting side were Garrison and Philips, and many of the best men of the nation, mostly in the New England States. On the political action side were the Tappans, Leavitt, Goodell, Codding, and nine-tenths of all the abolitionists of the country. Gerrit Smith was a man of power with these political actionists. The first man ever to advocate the formation of a Liberty party in politics, as near as I can learn, was Jacob LyBrand, of Racine, Wisconsin, which was about 1837; but it was only a recommendation. The voting abolitionists were politicians without a party for some time after this division took place. Myron Holley, who was in 1832, the editor of the Anti-masonic Free Elector, at Hartford, that supported Wirt for the Presidency, was the actual founder of the Liberty party, so far as it had a personal founder. Gerrit Smith so recognized him, and had a grand monument erected to his memory at Rochester, for which he invited contributors of one cent each from the colored men and abolitionists of the United States.

The first nomination for the Presidency was made in 1840 against Harrison and Van Buren, and four thousand votes were given. There was unity with the political abolitionists, voting for James G. Birney in 1844, till the Free Soil movement suggested by the Wilmot Proviso, and especially aimed to defeat Gen. Cass for the Presidency, took a definite form.

Garrison intensified his opposition to voting, resolving into non-resistance, and theanimus of hostility, is found in his position on the Constitution of the United States which he characterized in the language of one of the Prophets, for its assumed guarantee of slavery, as a "covenant with death, and an agreement with hell." Gerrit Smith took a view the very reverse. He believed the Constitution of the United States to be the charter and guarantee of Liberty, and under it no slave could exist in the United States. These grand divisions of the anti-slavery ranks mostly existed at the East—Garrisonism in New England, the Gerrit Smith party in New York; with scattering sympathizers to both of these theories in all of the Northern States. Everywhere, generally, were Smith and Garrison highly respected and loved by those who walked not with them. The main part of the political abolitionists who voted for Birney, afterward nominated John P. Hale, voting as a digression in 1848 for Martin Van Buren, then in '52 for Hale, and there formed what is considered the historical Liberty party. They were almost a unaminity of the abolitionists west of the State of New York. They generally believed with Smith that the national constitution was a good enough charter of liberty, but they were voting abolitionists under the Declaration of Independence, to make their power felt as voters against slavery. Logically the Gerrit Smith party had no ground for the ballot, as its statement made it a law question, and if the Supreme Court had so decided, slavery would have found an end without the ballot, without the ultimate war power that ended it with the bullet. The Liberty party of the Declaration of Independence, was a growing and popularizing party, voting for Hale, Fremont, finally Lincoln and success. Into that triumph came Garrison with a conscience full of reproach at last; there came also with the saviour of the nation, Gerrit Smith. Lincoln to us all was the man of the hour. There was unity at last in the divided abolition ranks, when the end of slavery came in a way that most of them feared, but few hoped for. It should be understood by all the world as justice to that small class of men in this country, who were ever despised, for whom now the public have some respect and a sort of heroic admiration that they were the only men who labored for the peaceful end of slavery, when it was possible to have it end in peace; they were the men who would have applied moral and statesman-like means for the end; they were, under God, the best friends the slave masters ever had in this country. I wish this fact to be emphasized, that our young generation may know it; and that our nation may be reconciled to those whom they have learned to hate, with their prejudice and hatred of the downtrodden race.

Gerrit Smith did not follow the direction of the current to vote for Martin Van Buren, John P. Hale, John C. Fremont, and perhaps not for Lincoln at his first election. So much had integrity of political action governed him, so much did he believe in uncompromisingly standing by the principles in their highest application, that he could not conscientiously do it. On the doctrine of no-slavery-in-the-constitution he was nominated for the Presidency by a section of the abolitionists who also called themselves the Liberty party. Wm. Goodell was the able editor and literary advocate of this party and their views. Fred. Douglass supported Smith. About 5000 votes were cast for their candidate mostly in the State of New York, where Gerrit Smith was best known. They were votes for testimony. These votes were doubly armed. They told where ballots seldom reach, and where bayonets seldom go, into the conscience of the nation. Though the Western abolitionists did not give him their votes; for they never had participated in those logical pitched battles of their Eastern friends; they never repented and loved him the less. It is not necessary to believe they were any nearer right.

Bankrupt Debtors.

BY D. B. TURNEY.

Debt is a severe misfortune. It is a great grief. It is not a thing to be desired. But, I venture to assert, intelligent reader, that you are a bankrupt debtor. By this remark I simply mean to imply that you do not promptly pay what you owe, and that the fault is your own. Of course, you fire up at this statement. It is no more than I expected you would do. I am not surprised to find you so ready to deny the charge. I supposed you might be persuaded to call in question, if not to squarely deny the truth and correctness of my broad and sweeping assertion.

You say, and doubtless believe, that you are scrupulously punctual in discharging your monetary obligations and do not willingly owe the value of a copper cent to any man in the world. That may all be, and yet my question needs an answer. Do you honestly, frankly and promptly pay your debts? You reply that you do. Your friends say that you do. Your very enemies admit that you do. But still my query arises. It is not to be silenced in any such style. It is not to be quieted in any such a way. You may be as careful and as prompt to save in the interest and for the benefit of your creditor as if a constable with a writ was at the door. Do I deny that? Have I impeached your business tact and honor? Did I say or assume that your income and outgo were unequal? I answer on my own behalf, No!

However, here is the very point at which I condemn you. Do you not see the sad inconsistency of the way you act? Why are you so scrupulously prompt in paying debts of money, while yet you leave unpaid your debts of affection, gratitude, sincerity, charity, personal honor, high intellectual responsibility, and religious obligation? You ought, of course, to pay your money debts whenever they fall due; but you should exhibit the same scrupulousness in paying debts of a thousand-fold more importance and moment. Debts of duty should be as binding and as promptly paid as debts of money.

Every debt should be paid the moment it becomes due. Yours are due. How much do you owe? How much have you paid? How much are you unwilling to pay? Ah, these are questions!

Are you a Freemason? Have you taken a vow to ever conceal and never reveal something? Then, there is the wife of your bosom. Have you paid her the debt of manly confidence that is due? At the bar of your own conscience, in the sight of the Almighty Searcher of hearts, your answer falters on your tongue.

There is a poor fatherless orphan at your door. She needs food and shelter. She needs clothing and education. But her father in his lifetime was not a Freemason. Has the daughter, therefore, no claim upon you? Have you paid your debt of fatherly protection to that poor child? Ah, what answer—what answer can you give?

There is your bankrupt neighbor. Have you paid him the debt of sympathy that you are owing him. I'm afraid not. O, you bankrupt debtors, why do you not promptly pay what you owe, and make every wilderness of life become a fruitful garden of rejoicing? Will you pay?

Now, Mr. Editor, as will seen by the above, I have passed the examination in the ante-room, taken the arm of the marshal and been slowly marched around the room; while the lodge of Good Templars present, each one wearing a thing looking like a horse-collar about their necks, stood up and sung to the air of Harwell,

"Welcome, stranger to this temple,
To our altar now advance," etc.

Well, I was a stranger, and they did take me in. I supposed I was joining an order exclusively for temperance objects, but was badly sold. I have drank the water in company with the W. C. T. and W. M.; passed the guards, etc., and consequently am prepared to tell what I know about Good Templarism. Which I propose to do as soon as possible.

My reasons for doing so are: 1. That this order is a positive injury to the cause of temperance; 2. Because it brings people into Masonry, etc., who would never do so otherwise, popularizing secretism in all its forms; 3. It is a contemptible swindle; 4. It is manifestly a hypocritical institution; 5. Because it is under the control of Masons and Odd-fellows in all respects.

In my next I will open the door on a lodge at work. FIDELITY.

[From our Philadelphia Correspondent.]

The U. P. Presbytery of Philadelphia Again.

MR. EDITOR:—Referring to my article published in the Cynosure of February 11th, stating, for the information especially of your United Presbyterian readers, that in the official Presbyterial report of the recent "O. F." case which was tried in the Philadelphia Presbytery of the U. P. church, held here on the 12th of January, all mention of any such case was omitted in that report, as published in the Christian Instructor, and authenticated by the "Moderator" and "Clerk" of the Presbytery, and that that was done by compact or consent of the Presbytery—and referring also to your editorial in the same number of your paper (February 11th,) in which you hope for the honor of our common Christianity, and of the "United Presbyterian church," that I was mistaken in that statement, I now send you a copy of the Instructor of January 23d, which contains the presbyterial report, in order that you may see it with your own eyes. The fact is undeniable, and has exacted not a little surprise here among faithful U. P.'s, who were expecting to find a report of the case in their own church paper here, but whose expectation proved a vain hope! As you may be sure, a broad grin was on their faces when they made this discovery; and several of them have been making no secret of their sentiments of indignation.

It may seem strange that the members of the Presbytery who acted right, should have been weak enough to consent to the suppression of the report of the case in publishing the proceedings. Yet so it was. The request for silence was made by the senior minister in the Presbytery, who voted on the wrong side (i. e., not to sustain the appeal), and who had previously begged leave, but in vain, to be permitted to explain his vote in the report. The reforming portion of the Presbytery, seem to have been taken by surprise by this request to suppress the report of the case; and thus they yielded the fruits of the moral victory they had so manfully won by the day's proceedings. Well, thanks to the Cynosure, this temporary success of the secret-wire-pullers, by its exposure, will only promote and expedite the cause of reformation in the U. P. church. If I am not much mistaken, those ministers and their sessions in the U. P. churches here and elsewhere, who have been for years past guilty of shielding Freemasons and Odd-fellows, etc., in their churches, contrary to the express law of that church, will soon learn, by the publicity which you have given to this case, that their secret arts are about "played out;" and that in future honesty will be their best policy after all!

I have no pleasure, Mr. Editor, in exposing such matters. I have done so, only out of motives of duty, and in order to promote the reformation of the church of which I am a member. Reformation is impossible without a victim. Some one must be willing to become that victim. I have deliberately volunteered to be the "forlorn hope." Will not U. P.'s throughout the church all rally to the rescue of their church from a shameful subjection to Freemasons, Odd-fellows and Knights of all sorts, and make the testimony of their church everywhere, no longer (as it now is in many cities and places,) "a dead letter," as is boasted, but a vital, active and affective part of their church life? Then, indeed, the Lord will bless and honor them, and make them and their church "a praise in the land." W. S. R.

The Connecticut State Meeting.

THE ORGANIZATION.

WINDSOR, Ct., Feb., 1875.

Editors Christian Cynosure:

Considering that yourself and readers of the Cynosure would be interested in hearing of anything which was being done in the East to which the light is coming; by the way, our eyes being turned towards the West for our light, where it seems to burst forth with increasing brilliancy, illuminating some of the dark places of earth which manifestly are full of the habitations (lodge-rooms) of cruelty, I send you herewith an account of a gathering of Anti-masons at Hartford, Feb. 3d, and the organization of a State Christian Association.

This meeting and action had been preceded by powerful lectures given in different parts of the State by Elder John Levington, of Detroit, Mich. It may be truly said, that this kingdom of darkness has been made to tremble in our State, at the first onslaught. People are waking up to find this a great evil, and are earnestly desiring to hear and read more about it. We call upon our friends in the State for prompt and liberal aid.

In response to a circular sent to persons in different parts of the State for united council and action, to consider the best method of opposing secret societies, especially Freemasonry, the following named persons were present:

Samuel D. Green, Chelsea, Mass.; Elder John Levington, Detroit, Mich.; from Connecticut, Elder Albert L. Dearing, Colchester; John A. Conant; Willimantic; John Kitchen and David Carter, Hartford; Ariel Mitchelson and Amasa Loomis, Tarrifville; Cornelius R. Williams, Terryville; James Reed and Philip Bacon, Simsbury; Elihu Holcomb, Poquonnock; Charles T. Collins, George A. Fenton, Wm. E. Howard and David J. Ellsworth, Windsor; Elder S. Hines, Higganum.

Upon motion of J. A. Conant, that we proceed to organize by choosing a chairman and clerk, the following were chosen by nomination: Chairman, J. A. Conant; Clerk, D. J. Ellsworth. Elder J. Levington and Ariel Mitchelson were appointed commiitee on resolutions. Resolutions being called for, Elder J. Levington responded and read before the Convention a set of resolutions, which were taken up singly, and adopted by a unanimous vote.

OFFICERS OF THE ASSOCIATION.

For President, John A. Conant, Willimantic.

Vice-presidents: Hartford Co., Philip Bacon; Litchfield, Co., C. R. Williams; Windham Co., E. F. Reed; New Haven Co., U. B. Swift; New London Co., E. G. Loomis; Middlesex Co., D. W. Watrous; Tolland Co., L. S. Goodale.

Secretary, D. J. Ellsworth, Windsor.

Treasurer, C. T. Collins, Windsor.

Annual meeting on the fourth Wednesday of April next.

D. J. ELLSWORTH, Sec'y.

AN EARNEST APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE. READ! READ!!

DEAR CYNOSURE:—It gives me pleasure to say that a few of the friends opposed to secret societies met in Hartford on the 3d inst., appointed officers of a State society, and adopted a series of resolutions which I doubt not have been forwarded to you by our secretary for publication.

I cannot omit to say that our meeting was favored with the presence of that old and faithful veteran in the work, Saml. D. Greene, of Morgan times, author of the "Broken Seal" and other writings, and my earnest desire is (if consistent with the will of our Heavenly Father) that his life may be spared and strength be given him that he may be able to attend many such meetings and aid by his encouraging words and strong faith, made stronger by the good providences of God towards him and others who have been faithful in laboring to pull down this great barrier which stands in opposition to the advancement of his kingdom and the salvation of mankind.

In looking over the doings of our Anti-masonic convention held in Hartford, Feb. 4th, 1830, I find the following appeal directed to the citizens of our State which I deem very appropriate at the present time. I quote:

"Shall Connecticut be behind her neighbors in the good work of resistance to Masonry? She has not been accustomed to let others go before her when freedom was in danger. The sacred fire of liberty burns no where brighter than in the bosom of her sons; and no people under heaven have more to protect, of all that renders life desirable.

Arouse then, fellow-citizens, be firm and vigilant; follow not the example of the weak and indolent who cry, 'A little more sleep, a little more slumber?' the danger is afar off. Nor yet of those sordid men, who are looking to Masons for loaves and fishes. Be ye up and doing. Be not deterred by threats, frowns, or slanders, from discharging your whole duty. Disseminate information respecting Masonry, by every means in your power. Encourage the spreading of newspapers and other publications, in which the subject is discussed. Warn the young and thoughtless within your circle of acquaintance against entering Masonic lodges. Assist all whom Masonry holds in bondage to break their chains. Put faithful watchmen upon the walls, and trust none there, whom you believe will be seduced by her abominations. Persevere through evil report and through good report; then will your rights and liberties be secure. Our prayer to heaven is that they may be perpetual.

Brethren in Connecticut, shall we not emulate the spirit of our fathers, and profit by their experiences. Although our State is dotted over with temples "dedicated to "unknown gods," and the craft numbers 'its minions by thousands, who hold commanding positions, in church and state, yet they are comparatively few to the great numbers who have not ''bowed the knee to Baal," or been hoodwinked or cable-towed. And if we shall arouse and defy the powers of darkness and resolve that "in the name of our God we will set up our banners" and demand our rights for ourselves and posterity, these will come to our assistance. Instead of giving our patronage to editors and publishers of papers who are minions of the lodge, who are always eager to do as dirty work by disseminating falsehood and idolatry among the people; or to those who see the danger and refuse to give the warning; I say that such things aught not to be. Let us listen to none who give the trumpet an uncertain sound. Instead of the few copies of the Cynosure and papers of like character now in circulation among us, we should have at least one thousand copies taken in our State, and other publications put within the reach of every family. We should have a lecturer employed to spend his whole time in advancing the work among us.

All this can easily be done if there can be unity of action and a spirit of sacrifice. Shall we not deprive ourselves of some luxuries that we may have the means to help on this good work. "Cast thy bread upon the waters" is the Divine command, remembering that "it is our Father's good pleasure to give us the kingdom." Shall we be faint-hearted when we know "that they that be for us are more than they that be against us?" Let us put on the whole armor and fight manfully the battle of our Lord, remembering that to the faithful only are the promises made. Let every friend of the cause be active and earnest. Let us all strive to have a full attendance at our State meeting in April next, preparatory to the National meeting at Pittsburgh, Pa.

FRIENDS IN CONNECTICUT! Let us consider ourselves each and everyone, old and young, male and female, a special committee to arouse the people of our State to action. Make yourselves acquainted with those who are awake to the evils of oath-bound secrecy and catch the inspiration of earnest workers in the cause. Write to that indefatigable worker in every good cause, John A. Conant, of Willimantic, President of our State society. If you are not acquainted with him, make yourself so; it will do you good if you will follow his example. Call on or write to the Vice-president in your county and co-operate with him in every way possible to advance the work. Subscribe for the Cynosure! Get your neighbors to subscribe. Send to Messrs. E. A. Cook & Co., Chicago, Ill., and get books and tracts and circulate them among your acquaintances. A few good books, kept in circulation cannot fail to accomplish good results. Never forgetting to do all this and more in the spirit of Him who said "Not my will but Thine be done."

Jottings from the New York Field.

WESTVILLE, Jan. 30, 1875.

"I find the [Masons] strangely fantasied;
Possessed with rumors full of idle dreams;
Not knowing what they fear, but full of fear."

The above words but slighily altered from Shakespeare, seem fitly to represent a fact, as they read. There is, among the lodges, a sense of coming ill—"men's hearts failing them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming," so that in the Grand Lodge as rumor hath it, the question for decision, is: "whether we shall go down before the anti-secret fervor, or try to check it, by a deed which shall strike terror into the hearts of our enemies, as well as of the would-be-traitors among ourselves?"

One thing is certain, our work is not in vain. Our papers, books and lectures, are fast waking up the old Anti-masonic spirit, so long dormant, and the true demoniac spirit of Masonry, as well. The muttered curse, not always "loud but deep," which the lecturer so often hears, occasionally shape themselves into threats, and acts of violence, which smack of bloody hate. Poor fellows!—having sold themselves into a most galling slavery, in which they have most generously bought and paid for their own chains, and in which they are permitted to make no defense, I pity them, as a kind but skilful surgeon pities the sufferer whose life he would save at the expense of severe present pain; and so I go on with scalpel and saw, despite the victim's shrieks, groans and envenomed blow. But to my work.

FRANKLIN COUNTY.

Westville—not Fort Covington, as in my last letter,—a northern town in the above named county, was the scene of my next contest with the powers of darkness; I planted my batteries on Monday eve, January 18th, and opened fire in the presence of most, if not all the newly elected officers of Franklin Lodge, No. 215, F. & A. M. These, like brave fellows, came to the front, on my left, and commenced, simultaneously with myself, a running fire, the principal ingredient of which seemed to be, that myself and my authors were all "liars,"—they being not well enough read in their own religion to know their own authors. My theme was "The Religion of Masonry." The marshal, before I had developed my subject, triumphantly said, "yes! Masonry is founded on religion!" I thanked him for his admission, and placed him among my authorities and held him there, very much to his annoyance, as he began to see the use I was making of him. Before I closed my lecture he intimated, very plainly, that I might get some "tar and feathers," before I got away. I stopped my discourse long enough to call the attention of the audience to this manifestation of Masonic benevolence, and to thank him for it, and then went on. The treasurer made himself quite conspicuous, in some remarks, the meaning of which I did not catch. The senior deacon was much disturbed, and uneasy. The senior warden, smiling and wrathful, came to the front, and with something like a pocket-book in his hand, wanted to bet me a hundred dollars on some matter. His neighbors boldly said, he had not so much money with him. I certainly had not; and as I was utterly unskilled in that line of argument, I mildly declined to enter upon it. They all seemed anxious to find out whether I was a Mason or not. I allowed them to ask me the question several times; think I answered them once or twice. At length, the marshal rose to his feet, and demanded an answer. I finally said to him very quietly: "My dear fellow, don't you see that in asking me that question, you are playing into my hands? If I was not giving 'simon-pure' Masonry you would know I was not a Mason. Now you are puzzled." He winked a little, as though things were not quite clear to him, and gave it up.

When I announced my subject for the following evenings, and that I would draw all my proofs from Masonic sources, this seemed to astonish them much. Especially did it puzzle them to know how I was going to show up the oath from Masonic testimony. "Sam," the marshal, demanded how I could know that. I requested him to wait until the proper time came, when I would satisfy him that I did know. He wanted much to know then, but I was inexorable.

Closing the meeting I retired with the friends with whom I was making my home. The next day, the air was full of rumors. Some of the more sensible of the craft, attacked their indiscreet brethren, and fearfully violated that portion of the Master Mason's oath which binds them never to speak ill of a brother, "behind his back, or before his face." Threats were rife, as to what they would do to the lecturer, at last coming to this: "We'll scare him any way."

The house was filled that night to overflowing, either to hear the lecture or to see the "scare;" perhaps both. They heard the lecture I know; as to the other thing, I don't think it made its appearance. I finally turned to the craft and quietly told them I had been informed of their promised diversion, and assured them it would not pay as I did "not scare worth a cent." The evening passed off without molestation; though it was plain to be seen that the fires were only smouldering—not put out.

The next day I sent by some friends to Malone, who went into a Masonic lawyer's office, and procured for me a law book containing the Royal Arch and the Master Mason's oath, which had been brought out in a court of justice, and acknowledged under oath, by adhering Masons to be substantially correct. This with the testimony as to the truthfulness of ten of the obligations as procured from adhering Masons by the Rhode Island Legislature, and like testimony from the Legislature of Pennsylvania, with the New Berlin trials, seemed to satisfy the brotherhood on the last night that I did know what I was talking about, as I unveiled their shamefully barbaric oaths and held them up to view. At the close of my lecture the irrepressible "Sam" arose, and getting himself hurriedly out of his overcoat, asked me with much impressement, if I had not shown myself to be inconsistent, and therefore false, in saying that the Master's oath bound them not to initiate a woman, and then telling the story of the initiation of a lady in Ireland, and also in Vermont? He seemed to think he had me in a tight place, and waited patiently for my discomfiture. I answered him to the effect, that the inconsistency and lying was all on the part of the craft; as my evidence for the oath and for the violation of it was from Masonic authority, and he must not hold me responsible for their violation of their own laws. The audience laughed, and he sat down looking as though something had missed fire. At length he sprang up, and told us about a certain Baptist minister who had made a shipwreck of character. This he flung at me as a Baptist. I quietly replied that I had heard of that before, and asked him what relation that had to the facts and arguments of the evening. Not being prepared with an answer to so simple a question, he sat down again under the laugh of the audience. A Presbyterian clergyman present, who belonged to the craft, here arose and deprecated these attacks on the lecturer, whereupon the marshal again arose, and called his venerable brother a liar, for a mistake he had made, and at once atoned for, long ago. The senior warden here mounted a seat and put his fingers into the "pie," but soon drew them out again and descended from his perch to cool them. Nothing further occurred, worthy of note until I started for the door, when the senior deacon, a powerful man, followed, trying to get between a friend and myself. As I passed from the audience room to the porch, my left ear was saluted with an egg, which fell to the floor without breaking. I paid no attention to this, but passed on to the sleigh, in waiting a few steps from the door. When fairly seated, another egg struck with some force on my right ear, and fell back without breaking, into the hand of Rev. S. O. Hathaway, who brought it off as a brilliant, if not nasty specimen of Masonic logic, sending word to the thrower next morning to send us a Masonic hen to hatch "that egg."

Thus ended my labors in Westville. The lectures called out the people in larger audiences than I have elsewhere had. The people were thoroughly aroused, and the better part of the Masons were ashamed of their officers, who—as some of them said—wrought Masonry more injury than any lecturers. Between the two, Franklin Lodge, No. 216, has received a blow from the effects of which it will not soon recover. Brother Lewis Learned and his wife and family did all in their power for my comfort. I shall not soon forget them. Your readers will again hear from me at Cook's corners, some nine miles away. J. L. Barlow.

Lectures in Crawford Co., O.

Bucyrus, O., Feb. 8, 1875.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

I wish to say a few words about the meetings that Rev. D. S. Caldwell has been holding in Holmes township. He spoke three times on Masonry and once on the grange.

About one year ago I heard Amos Kensworthy, a minister among the Friends, preach. He said that when a preacher would cut all the corners off his sermon, it would not hurt; but leave them on so that they would cut and you would soon see the effect. As soon as he saw the people begin to stir, he knew the preaching was making an impression.

If this theory is correct, Rev. D. S. Caldwell's sermon got a deep hold on some. Before he commenced speaking, while the chairman was calling for order, one man belonging to a secret society, said that they were to "sit still and be skinned alive." He reminded me of the man who dwelt among the tombs. "I adjure thee by God that thou torment me not." The Rev. Caldwell commenced his sermon, but he had not got far till the corners of his sermon began to cut. Mouths opened; eyes looked wild. Some persons could not sit still. Almost every person in the house could tell who was hit. The anti-secret men and women were jubilant.. The next day the secret society men joined in saying that men like Morgan had perjured themselves in revealing the oath and could not be believed. It was not long before they had to lay aside the word perjury. For even the women told them that they were saying that Morgan had told the truth. Then they changed and said the Bible says no liar can enter heaven. They were soon driven from that post. The Bible is a poor hiding place for a man who has done wrong.

In this township there is one church whose officers all belong to the grange. They have not had a prayer-meeting since they commenced the grange last spring, yet they could keep up their grange meeting. The result is the church has gone down.

Well, the grangers were out. It was the first anti-grange meeting ever held in the county. Some grangers came eight miles. A master of the grange thought he was somebody, and squared himself, and said the grange was not a religious institution. The speaker soon set him down by saying that they had the Bible, chaplains and had prayers. He also read the oath as published in your paper. One granger said it was all false. But the secretary of his grange said it was word for word. Since the meeting they have shown their catalogues of goods, and now say the anti-grangers can buy as cheaply as they can, and that without "the mark of the beast." One granger said the order in Iowa and Illinois had accomplished their work and had no more to do; and he hoped that it would not be long before they would finish their work here. I think if they have a few more lectures from Rev. D. S. Caldwell, they will soon finish their work as a secret order. We know men who are trying to get members of the United Brethren church to join the grange, so that they will have to leave the church. Men who profess to be followers of Christ, and under that color are doing this dirty work of the devil.

From Coles County, Ill.

Hutton, Ill., Feb. 16, '75.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

Having noticed reports from different parts of the State, but none from Coles county, I thought perhaps you would like to hear from us on the anti-secret cause. There has not been much light given on the lodge here yet for it is very strong, there being so many Mason's, grangers, and Good Templars, but little is said against them.

The United Brethren is the only church opposed to secrecy and its members are divided a little, though but few are in favor of the lodge. Some are trying to be on both sides for popularity, and two belong to the Masonic lodge, yet remaining with the church.

Rev. S. Mills of Westfield (U. B.) gave us a lecture last summer on the lodge during a quarterly meeting, which made some of them blush and say, "It is all a lie. I have tried it and know that Masonry cannot be revealed." While some of them own to a part of the lecture, it seems they did not agree, and perhaps were not all well posted.

Some Masons say that a man, to be a good Mason, must be a good Christian, while others claim it to be only a charitable institution. Their Christians in this county are scarce; and for their benevolence, it is like the two boys keeping store—they being thei own customers.

The church of Christ is the only way, for Christ said, "I am the way." He also called laborers to work in his vineyard, not in a secret society; hence the church requires the earnest labor of all its members and both their time and money; and if they seek to throw their influence upon some evil order that is selfish, they are equal to an Ananias or Sapphira robbing the church of her power and influence which she should command.

But we are commanded to love the Lord with all our soul and our brother as our self. "He will surely reprove you if ye do secretly accept persons." (Job. xxiii. 10). "But if ye have respect to persons ye commit sin" (James ii. 9). Peleg.

A Pastor of Both the Sheep and the Goats.

YORK, Pa., Feb. 13, 1875.

Editor Cynosure:

The pastor of the 1st United Brethren church of this place, Rev. W. B. Raber, died a few days ago.

Mr. Raber has been here much of the time since I came out in favor of anti-secrecy. I gave him all the light I could, but could not win him to our side. On the contrary, he was very uncomplimentary to myself, and even charged the Cynosure with lying.

Ho was, I am told, a friend of the U. B. Tribune; and I frequently saw him in the company with Masons and other secretists. His funeral was attended by Freemasons and Odd-fellows, as individuals, and also by his own secret society in a body, with white gloves and green sprigs. Should not this cause all U. B. people who are opposed to rings to reflect deeply?

The Order United American Mechanics, to which it will be seen Mr. Raber belonged, is only a Masonic catpaw society, wearing aprons containing the square and compasses, and doing work "on the sly." I now understand much that I could not see through before. And here is a notice taken from the York Telegram, which explains itself:

"UNITED AMERICAN MECHANICS.—York Council No. 243, and Rose Council No. 316, O. U. A. M., are earnestly requested to meet at their hall in Centre Square, to-morrow, (Saturday) at 12:45 P. M., sharp, to attend the funeral of brother W. B. Raber, late of Perry Council No. 57, Duncannon, Pa." Very truly yours,

E. J. CHALFANT.

Interesting Political Letter From Mr. Needles.

ALBANY, Mo., Feb. 2, 1875.

Pres. J. Blanchard,

RESPECTED SIR:—I write to ask you if you do not think it best to begin to agitate the question of a political Convention to be held immediately after the adjournment of our Christian Association next spring at Pittsburgh. It will give us greater notoriety and bring together more people as well as give us a more distinct organization. Publicity is what we must have, and when we begin to talk politics other papers will help give us the desired popular attention. Our ablest men, I think, should at once be solicited to write articles for our papers, giving their views on the line of policy to be pursued through the campaign, and that should be so formed as to meet the wants of the West as it is to be the ruling power of this government. The views of Vice-president Wilson on the secrecy question ought to be known. Could not some of our ablest men interview him this winter, also General Sheridan? If we could so manage as to get them before the people, whether they made a formal acceptance or not, it might influence the Republicans to nominate them. Sheridan talks right and if he does not belong to a secret society we want no stronger assurance from him than we already have. When the said that secret societies are a fruitful source of evil in our government, he hit the nail on the head whether purposely or not. We will have to be wise as serpents, harmless as doves, if we save this government; and if we can so arrange it that our nomination will be acceptable to the people we will make a strong movement in the right direction.

I wish you would get Stoddard to come here. It is strange that we cannot get a State lecturer. I think there would be no trouble about his support. My father took one-third of my press and it is admitted on all hands that the paper will be published. We are increasing our list in spite of all the devil's forces combined. Yours,

G. W. NEEDLES.

From the Pastor of the Cadyville, (N. Y.) Wesleyan Church.

Mr. Editor,

WEST PLATTSBURGH, N. Y., Feb. 9, 1875.

DEAR SIR:—Please allow me through your paper (the Cynosure) to correct a statement made by Rev. J. L. Barlow, with reference to the pastor of the W. M. church at Cadyville. In the Cynosure issued Jan 28th, 1875, he (Mr. Barlow) reports his lecturing tour at West Chazy, Mooers, West Plattsburgh, etc. In this report he refers to the pastor of the Cadyville church, saying, that for prudential reasons had declined giving out our appointments. This statement is incorrect. I gave out the appointments as requested; but at the close of the meeting the brethren thought best not to have the lectures. Not that they were opposed to the lectures or not opposed to the works of darkness, they are all true in this respect. They feared the result would be unfavorable to the church interest. Under these circumstances I withdrew the appointments. I not only gave out the appointments for brother Barlow's lecture at Cadyville, but also at West Plattsburgh church on Sabbath at the morning and evening service, and urged the people to come out to hear. Furthermore I done all I could to secure the use of the Baptist church at Morrisonville for Mr. Barlow. But for some reason unknown to me he represents me as a diseased, sickly, weak, despicable being, and commends me to the nursing care of the Wesleyan friends. He thinks I certainly need a little propping up. Now I can truthfully say, (if I know my own heart). I am thankful for any influence which tends to qualify me for the great and noble work of calling sinners to repentance. As regards my own views of oath-bound and all secret societies I can say that from my boyhood I have thought but little of such organizations and their unscriptural workings. All who know me know well that I am not sickly, nor need propping in this respect. I have never felt it my duty to deliver Anti-masonic lectures. If I did I should go about the work at once. Doubtless some are called to this work, others are not. So we should let each work in his own respective sphere.

Concerning the tone of Bro. Barlow's language, referring to me, I must say, if I know anything of the love of Christ, or brotherly love which links Christian hearts together, I know well, that in this reference he has widely diverged from the principles of that love by his uncharitable intimations and ridicule. From the spirit manifested by him, I must say that I am unfavorably impressed. I am of the opinion that all who profess to love Christ and his cause should be careful to exhibit at all times the spirit of the Master. If not they ought to know that they subject themselves to censure and disrepute. Yours for the truth and a pure Gospel,

PASTOR OF THE CADYVILLE CHURCH.

Rev. S. Ranks—Information Wanted.

WAVERLY, Ia, Feb. 10, 1875.

DEAR BRO. KELLOGG:—Well you please publish the following inquiry which explains itself?

Some time in August last Bro. S. Ranks came to our place and gave us four lectures. He seemed to be a good man and was treated by his ministerial brethren (Methodist) as all are apt to be, by Masons, who testify against the craft. He told me his almost destitute circumstances, and that he had suffered much at the hands of his enemies on account of the stand he had taken. After he left this place we never heard from him until an article came out in the Waverly Republican (edited by the "Worshipful Master" of the lodge in this place), which quoted from another Iowa paper to the effect that Bro. Ranks "had been expelled from Boonsboro district conference for immoral conduct." Then followed abusive remarks by the W. M., reflecting on all our traveling lecturers. I wrote to Bro. Ezra Hall, who I had heard lived at Jefferson where Bro. Ranks did, and the letter was returned unopened. Now we are fearful that he is in the hands and power of his enemy, the lodge. Can any of the readers of the Cynosure tell us anything about him? We would also wish to know the particulars of his crime and expulsion from his conference. We want the truth. Address the writer at Waverly, Iowa, or through Cynosure.

P. WOODRING.

OUR MAIL.

James Pollock, Washington, Ia., writes:

"I would like, if I was able, to send the Cynosure to some of our ministers. They need its instructions very much, but they do not want the light. Many of them seem to be "dumb dogs that cannot bark, lying down, loving to slumber." (Is. 56 chap., 10 verse.)

Joshua Evilsizer, Sarahsville, O., writes:

"The good work moves on. In Summerfield, the seat of war in this (Noble) county, the Lord is most powerfully reviving his work among the Free Methodists. Up to the present time there have been fifty conversions and sixty added to the church, and the work is still progressing. May the truth spread until it shall cover the whole earth, and until Masonry with all kindred associations shall hide their deformed faces."

Enoch Honeywell, Atlay, N. Y., writes:

"I herein return to you one hundred and five names on petitions. Marcus Barrett, my neighbor, has helped me get them. He is ready to help our cause. But few villagers or citizens dare face the Mason lash. They want to sell their "silver shrines" and float in the biggest ship, whether steered by Lord or Lucifer. Try to induce every lecturer to take tracts and deal out at every meeting. Millions of our youth need information and counsel to avoid hidden snares—snares baited with decoys to catch and make them waiters and underlings to their "Worshipful Masters." Our sons deserve a better fate, and we must try to guide them, which you have long been doing. My head, heart, hands and pockets, are all in open rebellion against Satan's kingdom."

R. Loggan, Clifton, Kan., writes:

"I have had the pleasure lately of knowing of several persons leaving the grange. At a revival in Saline county, all the members of a grange but three renounced it. One who was a Mason, Odd-fellow and granger came out from all. We are gaining ground, but have not time, men or means to press the battle as we would desire."

J. D. Gillett, Henderson, N. Y., writes:

"I do not take the Cynosure to learn what Masonry is. I had a theory of it sixty-five years ago having for my authority Jachin and Boaz. Fifty odd years ago I had a collision with it, and much to my expense learned its practical workings. At the time of the Morgan affair I was prepared to work for its overthrow and did what I could until it was supposed that the thing was beyond the reach of a resurrection. But in this we were mistaken. The head which to us appeared as it were wounded to death (deadly as it appeared) was healed; and quite a portion of the world are wondering after the beast."

Joel Seger, Earlville, Ia., writes:

"I admire the tone of the Cynosure; it gives no uncertain sound. But it speaks forth the word of reform in truth and soberness. It is gaining friends here."

W. I. Nation, Huron, Ind., writes:

"Your paper is always welcome to me."

John P. Dops, Rockton, Neb., writes:

"I am a poor man and had all my crops destroyed by the grasshoppers. I had sixty-five acres in corn, fifteen in oats, and twelve in hungarian, all of which was a total loss. I am in very straightened circumstances at present, but I cannot do without the Cynosure. I would rather do with one less meal a day than to go without the paper. You may count me a subscriber while I live."

A. D. Carter, Deersville, O., writes:

"May success attend your noble efforts in the cause of truth."

Joseph Wren, Sturgis, Mich., writes:

"The grangers are increasing about Sturgis and Burr Oak."

Joseph Backus, Rush, Ill., writes:

"The first vote I ever cast was Anti-masonic. I have realized ever since that Masonry was a great evil and looked on with sorrow to see it rise in power in families and court rooms, and, worse than all, making its way into the churches and pulpits. . . The State lecturer was here at the school-house last night with good effect we trust."

Rev. E. C. Cooper, Bethany, Mo., writes:

"I am dealing out Scripture thunder against the dark orders and they feel it. I have of late turned away a Master Mason from the further affiliation with the fraternity, and have his renunciation in my pocket for publication. Attended the burial services yesterday, of a Mason. Died a Christian but was buried an atheist. Such is the binding and deceptive influences of this unholy order; that when asked which he wanted to bury him the Methodist or Masons, he said the Masons. He was very happy during his last days and two of his daughters were converted under my ministry a few days ago."

W. W. Ames, Menomonee, Wis., writes:

"There are many who would go for the Masons and Odd-fellows, but shake their head at the idea of ostracising the Good Templars. Yet, after all, the Upas tree must come up by the roots, tendrils as well as tap root."

C. C. Miles, Dalton, Pa., writes:

"One man a member of a Baptist church, and a Good Templar, on being asked to sign this "Petition" said he would do it, but on reading it said he could not sign it because it included all secret societies, and he considered himself bound by his "Good Templar's" oath. He seemed to think it was just as binding as the Masonic oath, except the penalties. He had "promised upon his sacred honor." I then referred him to Lev. 5th chap., 4th and 5th verses: 'Or if a soul swear pronouncing with his lips to do evil, or to do good, whatsoever it be that a man shall pronounce with an oath, and it be hid from him; when he knoweth of it then he shall be guilty in one of these. 2. And it shall be," &c. He said this showed him plainly that he had done wrong in taking an oath even to do good, for it was to do good that he went to the Templar's lodge. I think he sees how the "chickens of Masonry" are protecting their parent. I gave him some anti-secret literature which he promised to read."

Amos Colgrove, Farina, Ill., writes:

"I sent you what names I have been able to obtain on the above petition. I was very sorry to find so many who are disposed to favor secret organizations. It foreshadows evil to our already distracted country. Our much esteemed Methodist minister is a Freemason, and some of my covenant brethren (Seventh-day Baptists) are also Freemasons. We read in the Holy Bible that judgment must begin at the house of God. . . Where shall the ungodly and sinner appear? They that turn aside to their crooked ways, the Lord will lead them forth with the workers of iniquity."

Daniel B. Stump, Rising Sun, O., writes:

"I send you these two petitions with two hundred and forty-nine names. There are several names from secret-society men. I guess they feel like leaving them. I once belonged to the Odd-fellows, but I withdrew from them entirely. I have got my card or demit from them. I began to see the elephant. . . Secret societies are wicked institutions."

D. Reynolds, Belvidere, Ill., writes:

"I hope something may be done here to expose secrecy next summer."

Jacob Haffner, Donnellson, Ia., and his German Presbyterian minister send in the names of one hundred and eighty-nine petitioners. He writes:

"I would have got more if the German papers had recommended the petitions."

Rev. A. W. Paul, Dundee, N. Y., writes:

"All these names I send are genuine, honest, not one smuggled. Sixty-four voters and sixty-three others."

We think all the names received on the petitions are genuine and together from a noble host.

M. Liscomb, Goodrich, Mich., sends one hundred and fifty names, and writes:

"Some Masons would say to me 'You will not get rich circulating such petitions as that.' One said, 'If it was not for my grey hairs he would knock the head off my shoulders.' But that did not scare me. Send on your petitions and I will circulate them as long as I have got a head."

Robert Berry, Carbondale, Pa., sends the names of two hundred and twenty-eight petitioners. He spent ten or twelve days in collecting them. He is seventy-six years of age. This cause is deeply indebted for its present success to God's blessing on the wisdom and work of noble old men.

M. S. Drury, Castalia, Ia., writes:

"I send two petitions, seventy-three legal voters, seventeen are clergymen, and three are college professors at Western, Ia.; forty-seven on the other petition. . . I could have got many more but those I have obtained are the leading members of society, representing a large district of country."

S. D. Wood, Howell, Mich., writes:

"It is my intention to devote my life to the cause which I have espoused, which embraces every form of reformation to advance the glory of God."

Rev. J. P. Richards, Bowensburg, Ill., writes:

"It is with devout thankfulness to God that I am permitted to send you what I call such a formidable list of voters and others (115 names) against the secret orders in this corner of Hancock county, Ill. I fear that I have been almost guilty of the sin of limiting the power of God; for I commenced my work of circulating the petitions with lack of faith, but I prayed. I felt as did Elijah the prophet, and like him, too, I have found seven thousand who have not bowed the knee to Baal. . One lady, in the fulness of her heart, said to me, 'Well, I am glad that somebody has to take this thing in hand.' A man whom I met on the highway, said, 'God bless you my dear brother, you are just the very man I wanted to see, and gave me a hearty shake of the hand and requested me to go on to his house and wait there until he should return shortly from a neighbor's house. Another Baptist brother said he 'could sign the petition all over. The venerable Wm. Todd, brother of the late Dr. John Todd, who is spending the winter in their neighborhood, said he 'could sign such a petition every week.' Indeed, some men in this county are observers of the management of the courts in this county, and they can tell just as certainly where next year's lightning will strike as to determine before hand what the verdict of a jury, mixed with Masonry will be, where Masons are concerned. I am well satisfied that light is all that the American people want to seal the death and burial of Hiram Abiff. We have only to pray, labor and wait, and the victory will be certain in the end."

LEADING TEXT.—God is our refuge and and strength, a very present help in trouble.—Ps. xlvi. 1.

HOME READINGS.—Num. xxxv. 9-34; Deut. xix. 1-13; iv. 41-43; and xxxiii. 27-29; 1 Cor. x. 11-15; Heb. ii. 14-18; Ps. xci.; Jno. xvi. 1-6 and xvii. 20-24.

The practice of Goelism, i. e., of the nearest relation of an individual who was killed being bound to demand satisfaction from the author of his death, existed from a very remote antiquity (Gen. iv. 14; xxvii. 45). It seems to have been an established usage in the time of Moses; and, although in a rude and imperfect state of society, it is a natural and intelligible principle of criminal jurisprudence it is liable to many great abuses. Moreover, it had a tendency, not only to foster a vindicative spirit, but, in case of the Goel being unsuccessful in finding his victim, to transmit animosities and feuds against his descendants from one generation to another. This is exemplified among the Arabs in their present day. Should an Arab of one tribe happen to kill one of another tribe, there is "blood" between the tribe, and the stain can only be wiped off by the death of some individual of the tribe with which the offense originated.

The practice of Goelism obtained among the Hebrews to such an extent that it was not, perhaps, thought expedient to abolish it; and Moses, while sanctioning its continuance, was directed by Divine authority to make some special regulations, which tended both to prevent the unhappy consequences of sudden and personal vengeance, and at the same time to afford the accused person time and means of proving his innocence. This enactment seeured the double advantage of promoting the ends both of humanity and of justice. There were to be six of these legalized asyla, three on the west, and three on the east side of Jordan. Three additional sanctuaries were to be established in the event of their territory extending over the country from Hermon and Gilead to the Euphrates.

The roads leading to these cities were to be kept in good condition, and the brooks or rivers to be spanned by good bridges; the width of the road was to be 32 cubits; and at all cross-roads sign-posts were to be erected with the words, Mekeleth Mekeleth, "refuge, refuge," painted on them.

The establishment of these privileged sanctuaries amongst the cities of the Levites is probably traceable to the idea, that they would be the most suitable and impartial judges; that their presence and counsel might calm or restrain the stormy passions of the blood-avenger; and that, from their being invested with the sacred character, they might be types of Christ in whom sinners find a refuge from the destroyer (Heb. vi. 18).

The period of release from this confinement was not until the death of the High Priest. "That was a season of public affliction, when private sorrows were sunk or overlooked under a sense of the national calamity; and when the death of so eminent a servant of God naturally led all to a serious consideration about their own mortality." His death secured the complete deliverance of the man-slayer from his sin, only because he had been anointed with the holy oil (Num. xxxv. 25), the symbol of the Holy Ghost; and thus the death of the earthly High Priest became a type of the Heavenly one (Heb. ix. 14, 15). Jamieson.

Mr. Trumbull thinks that there is a decided advantage in having hymns stenciled on muslin sheets and hung before the Sunday-school, that all may see them together. By this means the scholars and teachers see eye to eye; all are looking at the same time toward the desk; the heads of all are uplifted; the singing is likely to be more distinct and harmonious. Of course, hymns that are copyrighted should not be used in this way without the publisher's consent; but that can usually be obtained. By this method the best hymns from all sources can be made available in the school, and they can be often changed without undue expense.—Bible Studies.

A Western Sunday-school idea is this: Biblical exercises are held every week, in which some Scriptural subject, as "The Rivers of the Bible," is dealt with. Each participant is previously given one river upon which he writes a sketch, giving the events connected with it. The research necessary in the preparation of the essays leads to careful Bible reading, and the entertainments are interesting.

NORMAL HINTS.—In preparing the lesson, study first the text of the lesson; study, secondly, the connecting history. Do not depend upon the lesson helps that are furnished. Make constant use of the Bible. Read carefully, read thoroughly everything which comes between the last lesson and the present one. Study, thirdly, the parallel passages. For this purpose a good reference Bible is a necessity. These three points faithfully observed are worth more than all the "helps" ever published. In studying the text of a lesson, look for the following points: (1.) Time. (2.) Places. (3.) Persons. (4.) Events. (5.) Sayings. (6.) Difficulties. (7.) Doctrines. (8.) Duties. Do not look for all these at the same time. Read the lesson through with reference to the first element. Then again with reference to the second, and so on.

MONUMENTS.—Fellow-teachers, we are building monuments. The memorial erected by Israel in the plains of Jericho has perished; those which we build will last forever. They built of stone, we, of truth. They built upon the earth, we, upon the hearts of our pupils. The memorial in Gilgal told of God's power to give temporal victory and salvation to his people. Let ours tell of the power of Jesus' blood to save from sin. "Take heed how ye build." (See Matt. 7. 24–29.)—Sabbath Recorder.

The great German Field-Marshal thus expresses himself in a late letter: "It is sad enough when armies are compelled to lacerate each other; but it is absolute return to barbarism when whole nations are let loose. Warfare by regular armies is like a thunderstorm, devastating doomed tracts of land with fearful effect. But a struggle like the one now going on in Spain may be aptly compared to a fetid atmosphere destroying the harvest of a whole kingdom."

THE RIGHT MOTIVE.—It is related when Andrew Fuller went into his native town to collect for the cause of missions, one of his old acquaintances said:

"Well, Andrew, I'll give five pounds, seeing it's you."

"No," said Mr. Fuller, "I can take nothing for this cause, seeing it's me,' and handed the money back.

The man felt reproved; but in a moment said.

"Andrew, you are right. Here are ten pounds, seeing it's for the Lord Jesus Christ."

The Travesty of Religion.

The forcible and awfully true expression of the late Thomas E. Thomas, of Dayton, that Freemasonry is the "godless ape of the Bride of Christ" is brought out with great distinctness in Masonic writings. Read the following quotations; compare them with the ceremonies of the Master's degree, and you will exclaim with John Wesley that Freemasonry is an "amazing banter on mankind!"

(From p. 309, "Theocratic Philosophy of Freemasonry," by Rev. G. Oliver, D. D., London, 1840.)

This degree has a reference to the Christian dispensation when the day of salvation is more fully revealed; atonement is made for sin; and the resurrection from the dead plainly communicated and confirmed by the resurrection of Christ from the grave. The Jewish law had degenerated into a mass of rottenness and corruption: piety, which planned the temple at Jerusalem, was expunged; the reverence and adoration due to the Divinity was buried in the filth and rubbish of the world; and religion and morality were scattered to the four winds of heaven. Three ruffian nations from the south, the west, and the east—the Syrians, the Chaldeans and the Romans—gave in succession this temporary dispensation its deathblow; those who sought religion through the wisdom of the ancients were not able to raise her; she eluded their grasp, and the polluted hands were also stretched forth in vain for her restoration. Her tomb was in the rubbish and filth cast forth from the Temple, and acacia waved its branches over her monument. In this state of darkness and despair she lay until the Saviour came, instituted the five points of Christian fellowship, and raised her from the dust in which she had been indecently interred, to a more glorious inheritance.

(From vol. ii. p. 176 of "The Historical Landmarks," by Rev. G. Oliver, D. D., London, 1845.)

This interpretation is borne out in the higher degrees of sublime Masonry. Thus in the thirty-second, or degree of Prince of the Royal Secret, according to the continental nomenclature, the following analogies are explained: "The symbolical mystery of the death of (Hiram Abiff) represents that of the Messiah; for the three (blows) which were given to him at the three gates of (the Temple) allude to the three points of condemnation against Christ at three separate places, viz: before Caiaphas, Herod and Pilate. It was from the last that he was lead to that most violating and excruciating death. The three (blows) were given with the three (tools, i. e., gauge, square and gavel). These are symbols of the blow on the cheek of Christ, the flagellation and the blow with the spear. Some substitute for the latter, but with less propriety, the crown of thorns. The brethren assembled around the grave of (Hiram Abiff) are a representation of the disciples lamenting the death of Christ. The Word, which was said to be lost, was pronounced upon the cross, which the Jews could not comprehend. The false brethren are represented by Judas, who proved false to his Master; and the sprig of cassia represented the cross, of which wood it is said to have been composed."

THE NATIONAL PUBLISHING HOUSE.

THE PROPOSITION.

The Sub-committee appointed by the Executive Committee on a National Publishing House, after conference with Mr. Carpenter, are prepared to recommend the following:

1st. That Mr. Carpenter's provisory donation of lot 23, block 53, Carpenter's addition to the city of Chicago, with the improvements thereon, valued at $30,000, be accepted.

2d. That $10,900 be raised at or before the annual meeting of the National Christian Association at Pittsburgh, June 8th to 10th next, to secure the use of said property.

3d. That within three years after July 1st, 1875, the further sum of $20,000 be raised to secure the said property in fee simple.

4th. That in connection with the above, the additional sum of $40,000 be raised so that the sum total of the National Christian Association shall be $100,000, to be used under the direction of the Executive Committee in promoting the publishing and other legitimate interests of the said association.

C. R. HAGERTY,
J. BLANCHARD,
H. L. KELLOGG.

Address of the Executive Committee.

The Executive Committee of the National Association respectfully submit to the members of said Association throughout the country, and to the Christian public generally, the following facts and considerations:

Our National Association has had a limited and precarious support since its organization in Pittsburgh in 1868, now near seven years ago. And although little has been achieved in comparison with the vast and mighty objects to be accomplished, yet something has been done.

1. We have called the attention of the nation to the secret false worships which are displacing the worship of Christ and preying like night vampires on the vitals of the Republic.

2. We have unveiled the nature of the secret orders, and shown them to belong to the same family with Jesuitism, the commune, spirit-circle, free-love, and disorganizing clans of the South, all which place the Christian religion on a level with, or below even the false religions of the earth.

3. We have encouraged and strengthened the hands of those Christian denominations which have seen the anti-Christian nature of the secret orders and their rites, and excluded those who adhere to them from their communion.

4. We have encouraged a goodly number who were ensnared by the lodges to come out from, renounce and expose them, while a much greater number have silently withdrawn, and less substantial men have been joining them.

5. We have called out, commissioned, and imperfectly supported a few lecturers who have been struggling to shed light on the gross darkness in which the silence of press and pulpit have enveloped the nation. Such lecturers are now wanted in every State.

6. We have started and sustained, as we have been able, a national paper, the Cynosure, which now gives weekly to nearly two thousand, or by count, nineteen hundred and twenty-four post-offices scattered through thirty-two States and five Territories from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic; and from Washington Territory, the Canadas and Nova Scotia to the States along the Gulf of Mexico. This is the fulcrum of our movement.

From this root, other papers have sprung and are springing up; and several able denominational journals are, together with these, pouring light on the one great fact that the secret orders are in their nature pagan, and destructive of Christian civilization. And, chiefest perhaps of all, we have brought, and, by God's help, are bringing many to see clearly that Jesuitism, Freemasonry and all false forms of society have one heart and one head, and must stand or fall together; that their mock-solemn forms, mysteries, and rites, are religious shams, substituted for the atonement of Christ, and so are cutting loose this globe from its God, giving back its religion to priests and its government to kings.

But, though not discouraged, but amazed rather at progress so disproportioned to its means, we are quite aware that we have only reached the twilight which precedes the day; and that to stop where we are is to falter and fall back. We must revolutionize the mind of forty millions of American people, a majority of whom will be with us when they know the truth. We must bring this country to see that every strange oath is a blasphemy, and every strange worship, idolatry. We must cast out Freemasonry from the church, the jury-box and the ballot-box; because, that while its secret empire is nascent treason, it is the most respectable and least suspected of our national evils. And it is simply obvious that no existing organizations will or can achieve this mighty work if we give up our national movement and fall back on the other forces now at work. Political parties and Christian churches, or even popular evangelical movements which have Freemasons in them, will no more uproot the lodge, than the Southern churches which had slaveholders in them, could or did destroy slavery.

It is these views, and views like these, which have led Mr. Philo Carpenter to propose to give the National Christian Association a "house and home" in Chicago, provided the friends of the cause throughout the United States will give, in good subscriptions a sum sufficient to keep up the property which he proposes to give, and carry on the business of a national printing-house and book and tract concern in this city.

The first grand want of the cause is a secretary who shall give his whole time to the oversight and general management of the cause. Such a man is needed by this cause, as secretaries are needed by the American Missionary Association to look after and sustain teachers in the mission fields of that body.

Then we need an appropriate room fitted and kept up, in such a building, for daily prayer and conference, where it will not be considered any offense against the rules to pray God to sustain our lecturers and to overthrow "The unfruitful works of darkness" and strongholds of Satan in this country. If such a prayer-meeting can be established and kept up here, it will be frequented by the most earnest and godly young men in the various Theological Seminaries of the city and its envions, and in time will leaven the whole lump of American Christianity.

Then there are multitudes of humble, faithful and godly ministers who would read and circulate the papers, books and tracts of this reform, but who cannot, and their people, until enlightened, will not buy them.

Then we need rooms for the regular meetings of a National Committee, like those occupied by the Anti-Corn-law league of England, which drove the famine wolf from their doors and gave cheap bread to the English people. If we had such rooms our meetings would be more regular and attended by increasing numbers. The bare announcement that we had such a "house and home" of reform in this city would make the night-lodges turn pale.

And not the religion only, but the politics of this country imperatively need such a national light-house of reform. Parties which have offices and patronage to distribute will be more or less corrupt until we have a "new heaven and new earth wherein dwelleth righteousness." And if we may believe Bismarck, Disraeli and Gladstone, the chief danger to popular welfare and popular rights, is now coming over the nations in the shape of the sworn secrecy, priest-craft, and secret subjugation of man to man, which this National Association has been created and brought into being to oppose.

We therefore recommend that immediate measures be taken by all friends of the cause, in the several States where the reform has spread, to raise the sum required to secure the munificent donation proposed by Mr. Carpenter to our cause; and that the subscription be reported through the Cynosure as it proceeds.

And we recommend that the most strenuous efforts be put forth in connection with our next Anniversary at Pittsburgh, June 8th next, to complete the subscription and secure the building.

And we respectfully and earnestly request the Christian women of Chicago in particular, and the country at large, to aid this object by their counsels, their prayers and contributions.

THE CHURCH UNION.

This paper, whose editor we last week noticed as yielding "SMOKE FROM THE PIT," is a large, first-class print in New York, which has been published not quite two years. It seems to be one of that class of newspapers which seek to unite Christians by throwing out everything which distinguishes Christ from Belial, or his church from the world. And yet this strange organ has gathered and publishes as standing matter the names, by count, of more than two hundred prominent ministers and Christians whose names are appended to the following:

"We subscribe to the above principles and are deeply interested in the welfare and maintenance of the Church Union."

But among the "principles" to which the names are attached, Freemasonry is not one. There are many among them who will abhor the editor's advocacy of the lodge as we do. We shall look to see those names speedily withdrawn from a print whose editor says of the Masonic lodge and the old blinding heathen "mysteries" from which sprung, that "God has been in it for the good of our race!" and who endorses the lying fantasy that the "wise men" who worshiped the infant Saviour were Masons. If Masons worshiped the Saviour in the manger, they have surely turned him out of the lodge since, and hail his murderers as equal "brethren of the mystic tie."

Among the endorsers kept standing in the Church Union we notice the names of Mark Hopkins, Theodore D. Woolsey, T. DeWitt Talmage, and men of that class at the East, and Pres. Sturtevant and Rev. F. Bascom, D. D., here in Illinois. Dr. Bascom attended and spoke at our late State meeting in Chicago, and loathes, as we do, the sentiments quoted in our last week's article entitled "Smoke from the Pit." The paragraphs quoted, however, are but island specks in an article which is a whole sea of false history and false doctrine. A New York editor who can, at this day, and in that State, declare the Anti-masonic movement headed by Wm. H. Seward to be "all froth," is himself "froth," if the skimmings of corruption can be called by so harmless a name. Was it "froth," forsooth, that murdered Morgan? "Froth" that cleared his murderers in the face of law? "Froth" that caused forty-five thousand Freemasons in the words of Bob. Morris, "to quit their lodges to return to them no more?" "Froth," that enacted laws prohibiting Masonic oaths in three States, and cast the entire electoral vote of one State solid against the lodge? If Seward and Fillmore and Granger of New York, John Quincy Adams of Massachusetts, and Stevens of Pennsylvania were "froth," what is an editor who finds Christ in the lodge?

SAPPING AND MINING ERROR.

We have received the following note:

EDS. CYNOSURE:—How do you answer this argument? Slavery and the slave trade, and perhaps many other popular and national sins, existed and were practiced in the Bible times under the eye of its writers. Yet they did not denounce them openly, preferring the wiser method of supplanting them by the establishment of Gospel principles. We ought, therefore, to deal with Masonry in the same prudent and pacific manner, undermining it by getting people saved, instead of arousing individual and party opposition by openly antagonizing the institution.

Respectfully,
C. M. DAMON.

OUR ANSWER.

1st. The objector's main fact is a mistake. The sacred writers everywhere denounce the evils they would remove, when they met them. This we established against the apologists of slavery and opponents of abolition (Neh. v. 5. and Jer. xxxiv. 15); and I heard old Dr. Lyman Beecher, after showing that Moses changed the slavery of the heathen into just Hebrew bond-service, exclaim at the top of his voice, "No, 'twant slavery! Its mockery to call it so." And as Barnes showed, Christ probably never saw a slave or a harem, and hence, denounced neither. His system expelled both.

2d. Slavery and slave-trade were both overthrown by direct attack and 'antagonism.' So was Freemasonry in 1826–31, in the free States where it was attacked and 'antagonized.' In the slave States, where ministers did not attack it, but opposed it by "getting people saved," it grew strong under their altars, came back and retook the North.

3d. European villanage was overthrown by direct attack. The manumissions ran Pro Amore Pei. Pro salute animae, "for the love of God, and for the salvation of the soul," showing that the Gospel was specifically set against it.

4th. Freemasonry is heathen, i. e., Christless worship. The strongholds of Satan are not won by sappers and miners. One error or interest may be displaced by another, but the entrenchments of sin are taken by open assault.

BYRON LODGE, ILL.

"A lie well stuck to is better than the truth wavered," seems to be a maxim of the lodge. Some one has sent us the Byron (Ogle Co.) News, containing a weak re-hash of the ordinary platitudes of Freemasons' inauguration speeches. Take the following sentences as specimens:

"It (the lodge) allows its members to enjoy their religious opinions, whatever they may be, Christian, Jew, or Gentile." And then a few lines on, "Our standard authority and chart is the Holy Bible, known as King James' version of the Old and New Testament," etc., etc.

Now is not the statement that the "standard authority" of an order made up in part of "Jew and Gentile," is the Holy Bible, a simpleton's falsehood on the face of it? Christ said of the Scriptures, "They are they which testify of me." Do the Christ hating Jew and idolatrous Gentile take Christ's Bible as their "standard authority?" If not, is not the lodge a cheat; using the Bible as counterfeiters use good money, or as a fisherman uses bait? And how hardened is that knavery which dares use the word of God to hide under!

Then the stale, fulsome boast of "never failing charity which upholds universal love!" This windy brag must have produced a smile even in the lodge, unless the men of Ogle county are weaker in the head than we take them to be. This society of "universal love" is a lodge whose constitution rejects from its membership all women, and all but able-bodied men; and these it swears to have their throats cut, and hearts and bowels torn out if they tell what is done in the lodge to carry out "universal love!" Will the people of Ogle county support a print which lends its columns to such an imposture? No horde of vagrant, fortune-telling Gypsies could exceed such rant in ignorance, grandiloquence, lying pretensions, or slyness of design. And yet a strange sorcery attends them which would "deceive, if possible, the very elect." But here comes another sent us by good Deacon West, with a request to notice. It is in the Petaluma (Cal.) Argus. It is in a higher style, but on a moral level with the trashy performance at Byron. We can only note a point or two; nor need we, for Masonic speeches are as like as the mooney seances of the circle.

This writer says of Masonry: "It is the father and great grandfather of all the secret societies now in existence." This is one truth. Then, after naming the mysteries of Egypt and Greece, which, of course, were Gentile or devil-worship, he asks: "What were these mysteries but the real workings of Masonry?" We answer, nothing.

But this is his climax: in our slavery war, he says, "Still Masonry had such magnetic power within the circle described by her compass, that she has cemented North and South, East and West, into one loving brotherhood!" There, that will do. If true it was treason. If false it was Masonry.

NOTES.

—As our Philadelphia correspondent suggests, we have examined the report of the meeting of the Presbytery of Philadelphia in the 6th U. P. church, Jan. 11th, 1875, and find not the remotest allusion to the Odd-fellow contest which there took place, unless it be the first sentence which reads hideously: "The meeting was a full and pleasant one!"

—The notices will be found out of their usual place this week. Read them and the publisher's suggestions on the last page.

—The Mansfield convention leads off nobly in appointing delegates to Pittsburgh. The following were appointed from the meeting (which was not a meeting of the State Association as some may have supposed): Revs. D. Yant, of Bolivar, R. H. Pollock of Wooster; D. D. Hart, of Osceola and H. H. George, of West Geneva. The State Executive Committee met at the same time and appointed Wm. Wishart, Wm. Dillon, Levi Moore, George Clark, Samuel Hale, R. B. Taylor, D. S. Caldwell and Michael Long, and provided for increasing the list.

—The friends who were sorely disappointed at not hearing Bishop Weaver at Mansfield will change that feeling to a sincere sympathy with him in the afflictive providence that kept him at home. He buried an infant son on the Thursday before the convention, and the feeble state of his wife's health made it unwise to leave her. A note explaining the circumstances and expressing deep interest in the meeting was sent to Bro. Stoddard, but was delayed in reaching him until after the convention adjourned.

—A. Parmenter, a radical Anti-mason since the Morgan times, died Jan. 20th at the age of 89 years, at the residence of his son in Springfield, Bradford county, Pa. Thus the veteran ranks are thinning one by one.

—The Mansfield meeting received the National Publishing House proposition, when presented by the General Agent, with enthusiastic demonstrations of approval. In committee of the whole the proposition was discussed with hearty expressions of gratitude to the donor of the building and of endeavor to raise the sums needed. The following passed unanimously:

"Resolved, That we approve the plan proposed for establishing a Publishing House. We recommend with gratitude the acceptance of Mr. Carpenter's proposition, and will use all proper means to render the same effectual."

Gerrit Smith and his Biographers.

Rev. O. Wilbur, of Vineland, New Jersey, writes as follows to the Baptist Weekly, concerning the important omission in the history of Mr. Smith which has already been noticed in our columns:

The Examiner and Chronicle of the 7th Jan., contains, in an editorial column, a notice of the death of Gerrit Smith, of Peterboro, N. Y., with a sketch of some of the characteristics of his life, as a citizen and large-hearted philanthropist. He is spoken of as a radical temperance man; and among the earliest and most uncompromising abolitionists. This is all very true; and, it is equally true, and should, I think, have been added, that Mr. S. was as decidedly opposed to all oath-bound secret societies, as to intemperance and slavery.

At the New York State Convention, held at Syracuse four years ago last November, at which a State society was organized, auxiliary to the National Christian Association, opposed to secret societies, Gerrit Smith was present, and, although in poor health, made a very able and impressive address, and gave, I remember, fifty or one hundred dollars toward defraying the expenses of the convention. His address was published in the Christian Cynosure. It is but just to the memory of Mr. S., and to those who, like him, dare to be out-spoken against oath-bound secret societies, that he was decidedly opposed to all such organizations, as dangerous and damaging to the community.

On this merited rebuke the Religious Telescope justly remarks:

A failure to tell the whole truth is frequently as positive falsehood as anything can be. Ananias and Sapphira "lied" keeping back part. When a distinguished man dies, loud mention is made of the reforms in which he took active part. But if he was equally active in a movement unpopular and not yet consummated, his part in it is not alluded to as either a fault or a merit. If it were not for the proverb that nothing but good should be spoken of the dead, he might indeed be censured by some for his activity in the unpopular cause.

We are sure that Mr. Smith himself would not approve of the delicacy or dishonesty of his panegyrists who kept back part of his noble record, and thus deprived the public of the full force of his far-seeing and discriminating judgment of things that effect the general welfare.

Doubtless the resting warrior as he looks back upon his life-struggles watches with greatest interest the movement which enlisted him last, and which would have received his grand labors if old age and declining health had not prevented him from equaling its importance by the intensity of his activity in it.

Reform News.

From Jo Daveiss County, Ill.

HOUGHTON, Ill., Feb. 9, 1875.

Editor Christian Cynosure:

The following is a short account of the anti-secret society reform in this part of Jo Daveiss county. The first opposition made here against secret societies was about five years ago. A lady named Hayden preached at the Brick School House, about three miles east of this place. She always had a large congregation and in the course of her remarks never forgot the Freemasons and Odd-fellows, and I believe they never afterwards forgot her. For a time but a very few seemed to believe the books she read; but she kept on in her good work, and before many months had passed away a few began to speak out with boldness that they had looked at oath-bound secret societies in every light and they considered they were wrong. Time wore on. The little Anti-masonic band were mostly men and women who always appeal to their Heavenly Father in every trial, and while they were doing their best in the good cause a few leaflets, tracts and paper called the Cynosure came this way.

I have watched both parties very closely in this contest and have seen the opposition always a calm, cool, deliberate self-possessed people. They oppose the lodge because it is wrong, and are willing to fight it out to the bitter end. The other side as far as I have seen them, and that is considerable, have always whenever the Masonic question was discussed shown by their wild, reckless, abusive and often vulgar language that nothing but firm, deep and solemn truth could make such a stir among them.

About two years ago the following question was debated at Pea Ridge school-house in this township: "Resolved, That secret societies are productive of more evil than good." William Whitham and James Barningham took the affirmative; J. C. Spare and John Wener the negative and gained the decision. I listened to this debate and candor compels me to say that the affirmative was debated with great ability and firmness, and especially by the former speaker, who had been an Odd-fellow. The debate was long and very exciting; the affirmative gained the main point at which they aimed, and that was to impress the truth upon the people. They did it well. People now began to speak their opinions more freely and I have heard a great many young men say that they would never join any secret society. The Cynosure now aided materially. It is firm belief that the foundation of this movement is truth and that is a strength that whoever opposes it must oppose in vain.

Two years ago next May Rev. John Levington lectured at Warren, in the eastern part of this county, and in so doing he gave the Masons and Odd-fellows a great deal of wholesome truth and good advice. And what did he get in return? The craft done all they could do to injure him, his character, and the cause he advocated. Thus things have gone in this vicinity and I hope they will go on till success shall be given to the truth.

While speaking in private I have been asked if the Masons ever did me any harm, I answered, no; but just as long as their institution is anti-Christian and anti-republican I count them my enemies in that respect and they can count me theirs.

Yours truly,

JAMES H. BERRYMAN.

Good-By.

Good-by, good-by, it is the sweetest blessing
That falls from mortal lips on mortal ear,
The weakness of our human love confessing,
The promise that a love more strong is near—
May God be with you!

Why do we say it when the tears are starting?
Why must a word so sweet bring only pain?
Our love seems all-sufficient till the parting,
And then we feel it impotent and vain—
May God be with you!

Oh, may He guide and bless and keep you ever,
He who is strong to battle with your foes;
Whoever falls, His love can fail you never,
And all your need He in His wisdom knows—
May God be with you!

Better than earthly presence, e'en the dearest,
Is the great blessing that our partings bring;
For in the loneliest moments God is nearest,
And from our sorrows heavenly comforts spring
If God be with us.

Good-by, good-by, with latest breath we say it,
A legacy of hope, and faith, and love;
Parting must come, we cannot long delay it,
But, one in Him, we hope to meet above,
If God be with us.

Good-by—'tis all we have for one another
Our love, more strong than death, is helpless still,
For none can take the burden from his brother,
Or shield, except by prayer, from any ill.
May God be with you!

Cry Earnestly Unto God.

"Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." Psa. cxix. 105.

In the Himalaya Mountains there is a beautiful valley across one end of which flows the river Ganges, and across the other, the Jumna. This lovely valley is called Dehra Doon, and upon the heights which overlook it are two English settlements, called Mussoorie and Landour, where English people, whose homes are on the hot plains, come to spend the summer. And often when our missionaries were ill and not able to work on the plains through the hot weather, they also come to such stations in the Himalaya Mountains to breathe the fresh, pure air, and try to become strong again. Several years ago, a missionary who is stationed in Dehra, was spending a summer in Landour. One day he was invited to take tea with an English minister. He started for the minister's house just as the sun was beginning to set. As he walked along, he watched the big red sun slowly sinking behind the western mountains, and was looking with great enjoyment at the little villages, gardens, streams, and groves of the valley, lying far below at the base of the mountains. He also noticed a huge white cloud floating up the mountain-side, but he looked at it as simply a beautiful, airy, graceful thing and then walked on and forgot it.

After turning several sharp corners, he entered a path which curved and wound around the mountain, and then he noticed that the cloud was drifting in the same direction, and was very close to him. Suddenly it was upon him, and at once it became so dark, that when he held his hand before his eyes he could not see it at all. He knew that on one side of him was the mountain, and on the other a deep and dangerous precipice. So he stretched out his [alpen]ing stick until he touched with it the side of the hill, and in this way he guided himself and kept away from the edge of the precipice. But all at once the mountain seemed to leave him. He stretched out his stick this way and that way, and on all sides, but could feel nothing except the narrow piece of ground he stood on. This perplexed him very much and he could not understand it. But he happened to remember that he had seen a house in front of him, and he thought he must be near it by this time, so he shouted several times for help, and the servants of the house heard him, and came to his help with a lantern. When the bright beam of light shone upon the rocky hillside, and narrow foot-path, and flashed up into the dense foliage, and among the knotty and moss-hung branches of the trees, which grew along the wayside, he saw just where he was. He was standing on a narrow footbridge, while several feet below him was the dry rocky bed of a torrent, which, in the rainy season, leaps down the mountain side, and, roaring and foaming, dashes down the precipice to swell the streams of the valley. Then the servants walked before him, holding the lantern so that its cheerful light streamed along his path, and he was guided safely until he came out from the cloud.

Then he saw a new and beautiful meaning of the text, "Thy Word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path." When we are in great trouble, and cannot see what is best for us to do, we should cry earnestly to God, "who commanded light to shine out of darkness;" that he would shine in our hearts with the light of his knowledge. And, indeed, we cannot, without his help, take one step aright, so that we ought to seek to live in the light of his countenance, and to have our whole way made plain and clear by his precious Word, the Lamp of Life.—The Foreign Missionary.

Josephus' Testimony for Jesus.

Many quote this eminent Jewish writer's sayings as if he were an unbeliever in Jesus. It is thought his testimony on dispnted points in Jewish history and religion, is valuable as that of an enemy of Christianity. Is this a correct estimate of this great man? A brief quotation which I make from his antiquities of the Jews would appear to say that it is not. In the 18th book, 3d chapter and 3d section of the Antiquities he uses the following significant and striking language concerning the Saviour:

"Now there was about this time Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was the doer of wonderful works, a teacher of such men as receive the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him both many of the Jews and many of the Gentiles. He was (the) Christ. And when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at the first did not forsake him; for he appeared to them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him. And the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day."

In these remarkable words, Josephus gives us a brief but very comprehensive creed. He speaks of the facts he narrates, not only as things believed by others but also by himself. There is a wonderful harmony between his testimony to the character, person, history, works, death and resurrection of Jesus and that of the New Testament writers.—United Presbyterian.

Revival Work.

I had been trimming trees, and the piles of brush accumulated were unsightly and in the way. But rain kept falling on them, so that it was almost impossible to make them burn. I tried several times, but with poor success. At length, becoming desperate I resolved that, green or water-soaked as my brush heaps were, they should be burned. I gathered a quantity of dry wood and made a fire on the windward side of one of them. I fed this fire until the heat dried the brush and kindled it. Then I mixed more dry wood with the brush, and thus kept up my fire. In a short time my first heap was not only all in a blaze, but as hot as a furnace. Then I threw the rest of the brush gradually on the fire, which grew broader and hotter all the time, until the greenest and most succulent material was readily consumed. Now, when I had burned half of my brush, and the fire was most intense, I did not stop, saying, "This is enough for one day." No. I wanted all my brush burned up, and I did not want to repeat the kindling process. I knew that I could not have a better fire than I had already. I determined to use it as long as I needed it, and to make thorough work. Its momentum was such that it could consume the rest of my rubbish with ease, and in half the time already spent.

This homely illustration shows where the failure is in revival work. When the interest is at white heat, and every new convert, by his example and enthusiasm, adds to its intensity, no effort should be spared to bring all who can be brought within the range of its influence, to put all the fuel possible on the fire. To think of stopping because the meetings have continued the usual length of time, or because about the usual number have been converted, is so unwise that it almost seems wicked. One of the great practical lessons that the church needs to learn, and that right speedily, is how to keep revivals from stopping—how to use the heaven-kindled fire until all the combustibles are consumed.—Herald and Presbyter.

Why the Ends do not Meet.

There are thousands of families in this country and abroad who have always difficulty in making ends meet. Many of them are diligent workers and earn well, but their purpose of cottage and comfort are frustrated, and their purses empty. They are constantly falling short of their desired goal. They are of that large class who are ever making mortgages upon their earnings before they are received. They always flatter themselves that great successes are in store for them next year; so they go on spending foolishly in the meantime. The wants of these people are never satisfied. Like spoiled children, that which hangs so gracefully upon the shoulders of rich neighbors they must have. Everything that contributes to manhood and independence is sacrificed in order to get it. That was not the way that Benjamin Franklin mounted up to high eminence in financial and intellectual strength. He earned before he spent, and always expended with thoughtful judgment. His investments always brought home good returns. He was the friend of struggling worth, and because a wise spender he was capable of giving a helping hand where help was needed. Franklin always made the ends meet, and helped others to do so.

In the matter of domestic expenditures we have lost the common sense of our forefathers, and have consequently missed the contentment which distinguished them. We must, if we would be independent and able to help others, have reference again to first principles, and refuse to encroach upon capital, dealing sparingly even with the interest income. The family that would be prosperous and powerful for good must reduce their wants and increase their exertions. In the day of activity and high wages preparation is to be made for rainy days; and how can this be done, if, in the swelling tide, every member of the family with furs and feathers is aping the style and the outlay of families whose income is ten times as great.

This is the supreme folly of the times. It has crept into the church and is there doing infinite mischief, for with pain we record the intelligence that the Christian schemes and the efforts of philanthropists are hampered because of the silly expenditures upon self and families which are everywhere seen. We fill our wardrobes, load down our tables, entertain sumptuously, while missionaries are being recalled or starving at their domestic and foreign posts. The Lord surely comes to judgment with such folly and sweeps away the power that consumes upon lusts what was intended to lift the world up to Christian intelligence. The money we possess is intrusted to us to comfort the fatherless, the widow and the benighted, and when we are unfaithful to our trust we realize that as we have treated others so are we now treated ourselves.

What shall we say of that large class who daily waste, aye, worse than waste, dollar after dollar upon rum and tobacco? Who is surprised that these people after a while are unable to make the ends meet, and that their families are thriftless and extravagant? There are thousands of families living in fashionable and expensive quarters, sweating and scheming to equal their neighbors in what is called gentility, ordering from the markets canvas-back ducks and the choicest cuts, who are wasting their substance and beggaring themselves. In the course of time a panic strikes these pitiful families, and they are more helpless than dismantled ships in a storm.

That finished scholar and great apostle, St. Paul, had a trade. He always made the ends meet. He wasn't too proud to work at that trade for his daily bread even when he was the bearer of heaven's high commission. He would not be burdensome to any. Of course he never borrowed, for he always worked. No wonder the people were ready to give him themselves. St. Paul was a great doer. He had no difficulty in suiting himself to altered circumstances. He was content in any condition.

Dollars, like our faculties, are from God, and if we misuse them, certain it is there will be difficulty in making the ends meet. There is nothing like the common sense of Christianity to make families comfortable. Investments for others never fail of dividends.—N. Y. Witness.

An Englishman's Idea of Home.

"Home" in the days of our fathers was a word the sound of which was solemn as well as sweet. The very name had a music of its own, a poetry and a pathos that clung to it, as ivy nestles to the walls of some old house in which kindred generations have lived and died. To bid a stranger be at home was the heartiest dictum of hospitality. And what home was to the indwellers of the gabled hall, the snug parsonage, or the "great house" of some small sleepy town or straggling village, can scarcely be known save to those who have diligently studied the memoirs and letters of the eighteenth and seventeenth centuries. Our predecessors, both men and women, had a cat-like attachment to their dwellings, a strong local patriotism strange to us, whom advertisements of superior stone-fronted mansions and eligible villas constantly beguile to take up our abode in this or that eminently improving neighborhood. Home, too, was thought to be a phrase peculiarly English, and was all the better loved on that account. Benighted foreigners could not be expected to understand the love true Britons felt for the red bricks mellowed by age, for the deep windows coped with white stone, for the weather-beaten porch, and for the fragrant garden full of quaint old flowers and lucious wall-fruit; but to those who had been born within the four seas, home was an Eden. To feel at home was ease and comfort; while the dreary expression "all abroad" is eloquent in its illustration of a wretched, dazed, unsettled, and wool-gathering condition of the mind.

It may be in their adoration of home, as of some other national boasts, our ancestors rode their hobby rather to hard. The typical home, surrounded by none but peaceful, pleasant sights and sounds, might at certain seasons have been excessively damp, and for a considerable part of the year inordinately dull. A residence that seemed delightful so long as the shade of the great green rustling boughs fell upon the paths that wound among flower-beds resonant with the drowsy hum of bees, might present another aspect when the last brown leaf had dropped to add its tribute to the rottenness of the decaying vegetation, and when the heavy rain beat day after day on the lead-framed panes of the Elizabethan windows. But still the hereditary dwelling was beloved and believed in. Whatever its defects, it was always the dear old place, the paragon and cynosure of all possible homes, in the eyes of those to whom every jotting beam and blackening wainscot was as the face of a dumb friend.

How the change began, by what process we became weaned from our antique affections, it is puzzling to conjecture; but at any rate this much is certain, that from the most home-staying we have become the most wandering of European nations. Of course, in this respect we are very far outstripped by our cousins across the Atlantic. A sort of reproach attaches to a citizen of the great Republic who is content to die where he was born. Such a vegetable inactivity argues, in the opinion of his acquaintance, a contemptible lack of adventurous courage; a puny soul that shrinks from helping on the conquering march of that "manifest destiny" which is to raise grain-crops from the prairie, and to set up monster hotels on the Rocky Mountains, while removing buffaloes, Indians, and Mormons off the face of creation. But there is this difference, that an American is tempted to move by the hope of profit; whereas an English household would often be at a loss to assign any rational motive for the flittings that are a part of modern life. —Belgravia.

Books and Reading.

There are a great many young people who, with an intense thirst for reading, do not know what books will most perfectly satisfy their intellectual appetite, and if by chance they stumble upon one that just meets their wants, joy overwhelms them, like that of the seeker for hidden treasure when he unearths a pot of shining gold. If any such read these lines let them be assured that those to whom the "ample page" has been unrolled are happier in nothing than in pointing parched and thirsting souls to those fountains where they may slake their thirst and acquire an ever keener relish for the living waters of truth and beauty. There can be no monopoly of Plato, of Bacon, of Milton, of Shakespeare, and the thousand lesser stars that illuminate the world of literature. Each reflection of their brightness increases the sum total of light, and makes the world pleasanter for all the dwellers therein.

Doubtless the happiest people are those who can and do choose wisely and widely from books. "For books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a progeny of life in them as active as that soul whose progeny they are; nay, they do not preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them." "If I were to pray for a taste," says Sir John Herschel, "which should stand me in stead under every variety of circumstances, and be a source of happiness and cheerfulness to me through life, and a shield against its ills, however things might go amiss, and the world frown upon me, it would be a taste for reading. Give a man this taste and the means of gratifying it, and you can hardly fail of making a happy man, unless, indeed, you put into his hands a most perverse selection of books. You place him in contact with the best society in every period of history—with the wisest, the wittiest, the tenderest, the bravest, and the purest characters who have adorned humanity. You make him a denizen of all nations, a cotemporary of all ages."—N. Y. Tribune.

Which Track?

"Yes, mother, I know; but then, you see, my good feeling lasts only a jiffy."

So said my boy to me last evening in answer to my appeal.

"I know it, Henry," said I; "but how long does it take to switch off a locomotive on to a wrong track? Once started on the wrong track, no matter how smothly and swiftly it may run, it is running to destruction. On the other hand, a moment only, and the switch-tender will have put the locomotive on the track and the cars will go on safely.

"So with the heart. It takes only a moment to pray sincerely, 'Lord ,save me.' It takes only a moment to say, 'Keep me from this sin, O Lord.' It takes only a moment to say from the heart, 'Lord, give me thy Holy Spirit, make me thy child; do not leave me; let me not leave thee.'

On the other hand, it takes but a moment to say, 'Pshaw! what's the use? I don't care.' It takes but a moment to say, 'I'm not going to be laughed at for being a Christian, I know.' It takes but a moment to drive the Spirit of God away by simply diverting the mind, which may be done in many ways.

"And so the soul may be switched on to the right track or on to the wrong track in a moment of time, and either run safely to the end of life, by God's grace, or run swiftly and surely to destruction."

Is my soul on the right or wrong track?—Morning Light.

Anecdotes of Elephants.

The wild elephants roam about to feed at night, and appear quite glad to enjoy "a lark," such as pulling down a house and scattering the materials, or walking over and through it. "I remember," says a missionary in India, "of seeing the 'lines' or row of huts, occupied by laborers on a coffee plantation, through which a herd of elephants had walked on the preceding night, without any intimation of their coming, and without a single word of apology. No one, happily was injured, and though the poor men sleeping inside were astonished and terribly frightened at their strange midnight visitors, they were thankful to escape with their lives."

It is well known that solitary or "rogue" elephants are extremely vicious, making a point of attacking all passers-by. There is reason to suppose that they have been banished from "society" for some notorious crime or incurable vice. Two years ago, one of these dangerous animals was wandering about the Assambu Mountain, where one of our Christian people was killed by it. There were four native Christians residing at Nagercoil, who had been engaged by a planter for the erection of a house on his estate up in the hills.

These men used to come down on Saturdays to their own homes, returning to work on Monday morning. On Saturday they started together, as usual, but had not gone far when this ferocious brute rushed out of the forest upon them. They ran, and did not venture to look back till they had gone a long distance from the spot. When they collected their senses they found that one of their number was missing. Hastening to the nearest chapel they called some of the Christians, and going back to search for their comrade, soon discovered the body of the unfortunate man crushed and mangled by the savage brute. I understand that this elephant killed seven or eight people afterwards, but have not heard whether he was at length destroyed.

One of the most striking illustrations I have ever heard of the extraordinary sagacity of the elephant is related in Pettitt's work on the "Tinnevelley Mission." It runs somewhat as follows: "While the large chapel at Nagercoil was building, the missionaries obtained the loan of a trained elephant for drawing the larger timber used in its erection. The late Mrs. Mault kindly saw the animal regularly fed, lest the food should be stolen by the attendant. One day the allowance of rice seemed very deficient in quantity, and the good lady expostulated on the subject with the keeper. Raising his hands to heaven, the man loudly and with great apparent earnestness and sincerity, repudiated the idea of his having taken any of the rice.

"Do you think, madam, that I would be capable of doing such a thing? No, never! no more than I would deprive my own children of their daily food."

While he was speaking and gesticulating, the intelligent creature, slyly extending his trunk, unfastened the man's waistcoat, thereby spilling out the missing rice which had been concealed in a corner of the cloth, and exposing the dishonesty of the attendant. I have been assured of the authenticity of this anecdote by Mrs. Mault herself. —Morning Star.

Iowa Convention.

Rev. J. P. Stoddard, Gen'l Agent, will attend the Wisconsin State Convention at Delevan this week; and will go from there to ELDORA, Iowa, as announced two weeks since to assist the Iowa friends in organizing a STATE CONVENTION. But little preparation has been made through delegates and auxiliary associations for this gathering, but let the friends rally in force at ELDORA, Hardin county, on the Iowa Central R. R. on Wednesday and Thursday next, March 3d and 4th.

Indiana.

Friends in that State must be informed again of the urgent necessity of aiding their State fund which is still far behind. Bro. Leuty has sent in $20 which reduces the arears to $45.79. This and twice as much more is needed for the work in your State. What will you do to raise it THIS WEEK?

H. L. KELLOGG, Sec. Sec'y.
13 WABASH AVE.

The number of names received on the petition to Congress up to Feb. 20, is 12,778. We understand that many petitions have not been sent in yet, and the prospect is that they will not be sent to Congress during the present term. Fill them up and forward as soon as convenient.

—Little can be added to the rousing appeal of Philip Bacon to the workers of Connecticut. If they have a tithe of his inspiration in the work that State will soon be foremost in the work.

—As spring approaches no effort should be neglected by every friend of this reform to push it forward with all vigor. A half hour's thought will suggest, probably, to every reader, several measures by which their individual effort may advance the reform; write a letter, mail a tract to a friend, make a visit with the special purpose of enlisting a neighbor, or obtaining a subscription to the paper. With paper and pencil set down the plans you can reasonably execute in a week for God's truth against the lodge and you may be surprised; and when your plans are by God's grace carried into effect, you will be filled with the holy joy of a soul whose works prove its faith.

DR. HEMAN HUMPHREY.—We have the pleasure of presenting the views of this eminent divine and educator on the first page of this issue. Dr. Humphrey was born in Simsbury, Conn., March 26, 1779. He graduated from Yale in 1805 and after a course of theology under Pres. Dwight and Rev. A. Hooker of Goshen, Conn., he was ordained in 1807 over the Congregational church in Fairfield, Conn., where he remained ten years. The next six years he was pastor of the Pittsfield church, from which he was chosen President of Amherst College and was inaugurated to that office in 1823 when the institution was literally struggling for existence. His presidency lasted 22 years, and closed at his resignation in 1845, when the College was firmly established. After his retirement his time has been devoted to literary pursuits and to the promotion of the religious and benevolent enterprises of the day. His works have been chiefly on religious subjects. If not the first, he was one of the first to engage in the temperance refermation. A report which he drew up in 1813 had a wide circulation, and is believed to be the first temperance tract published.

THE GALAXY for March is altogether overloaded with serials, which on the whole, however finely written, improve neither mind or morals. There are other articles of value: a historical sketch of the meetings of Canova, the celebrated Italian sculptor, and Napoleon I., breaths the spirit of patriotism and noble independence. "Absolute Music" by Richard Grant White will be appreciated by lovers of that noble art. Sheldon and Co., publishers, New York.

A railroad war of more than usual importance has sprung up between the Pennsylvania road with its connections and the Baltimore and Ohio line. The latter connected with Chicago last fall and has met and stoutly fought a most persistent opposition. Col. Scott of the former line first formed a grand combination of the trunk lines at Saratoga. The completion of the new road broke this down. Now the two are fighting down rates until fare westward from Philadelphia to Chicago is twelve dollars, and freight in proportion. Of course this will soon be over when enough money has been lost to bring the poorest company to terms and then by mutual arrangement the public must pay off for their frolic.

Religious Intelligence.

—A revival interest of considerable and increasing power is being experienced at Wheaton College. Meetings are held every evening under the direction of the faculty.

—The church connected with Lebanon Valley (U. B.) College, Pennsylvania, has been lately revived. All the female students connected with the institution have professed Christianity, and all but four or five of the young men.

—The Religious Telescope of last week has reports from various churches of the United Brethren in Christ. Some 756 accessions to the church are reported and 875 conversions.

—The Free Methodist brethren at Attica, Ind., erected a church last summer and are now holding revival meetings under the direction of C. S. Gitchell.

—The Pearl Street Baptist Church, Hartford, now at the close of its first year of making the collection a part of each Sunday morning's worship, find that the gain has been sixty-six per cent over the preceding years. The large givers still continue to bestow former amounts to the various societies, outside the ordinary church contributions, which are usually in small sums, but these foot up the past year $5,100.

During a revival season in the United Brethren church at Altamont, Lower Wabash Conference, among other conversions and accessions, a Methodist Episcopal minister came forward to unite with the church, stating that one reason of his action was the restrictive clause on secret societies.

—A number of the United Presbyterian congregations in the cities of Pittsburgh and Allegheny and vicinity, have recently decided to adopt the free seat system, and raise the funds needed to carry on the work of the congregations in some other manner than by renting the pews.

—Among the protracted meetings in the Northwest, the Methodists report a considerable number of extensive revivals. According to the Northwestern Advocate Eaton Rapids reports fifty converts; Fairbury, Ill., reports eighty-three young converts received into the church. At Light House, near Dixon, Ill., twenty-three have been added to the church membership.

—The Methodist Episcopal church has twenty-seven universities and colleges, and sixty academies and seminaries. The estimated value of the property of these institutions is $7,000,000, exclusive of the three theological seminaries at Boston, Mass., Madison, N. J., and Evanston, Ill. The property in schools under the supervision of the church is $2,000,000.

—About fifty rose for prayers at the prayer-meeting immediately following the Sunday-school exercises at the Union Park Congregational Church last Sabbath. There is much interest among the young people of that congregation.

—The revival work in England under Moody and Sankey, does not go on without opposition. One minister of the English church, and another, a Presbyterian, have gained some notoriety by their denunciations; and now the Romish Archbishop Cullen, in a pastorial address, condemns the mission of the revival preachers. He says these men seek to do away with good works and the necessity of baptism, promising salvation by foolish sensationalism, without requiring repentance.

News of the Week.

The City.

Mrs. Van Cott has been holding meetings in this city the past two or three weeks, holding daily noon-day meetings in the First Methodist Church, and daily evening meetings in the Centenary church. Her work has been quite effectual among a rough class of men who are seldom reached by city churches. ——The frost has reached the water-pipes all around the outskirts of the city and effectually stopped them until a thaw. Even some of the street mains are frozen. The water department supply large districts with wagons from house to house.

—Two Germans were smothered to death the other day by a large pile of coal which they were shoveling at Dyer's yard, on Grove street. ——Wahl Bros. glue factory was entirely destroyed by fire on Monday morning before daylight. It was the largest establishment of the kind in the world, covering some 8 acres in the southwest portion of the city; turning out 7 tons of glue daily and employing nearly 400 men when in full blast. The loss is placed at $400,000 with $85,500 insurance.

Congressional.

The President has published a message convening an extra session of the Senate to convene March 5th.——The House has voted almost unanimously to repeal the act of 1872 granting a subsidy to the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.——Rufus Hatch, one of the directors of that company has testified before the Committee of Ways and Means that $2,000,000 have been abstracted from its funds that Stockwell, the president, and Irwin, the lobbyist, are responsible.——A bill appropriating $8,000,000 for the improvement of the mouth of the mouth of the Mississippi by means of the jetty system has passed the House.

General.

The Potomac River has been closed for several days from its mouth to Washington, a distance of about one hundred miles, and last week, for the first time in many years, an ice-boat arrived at Washington from Point Lookout. Much inconvenience is experienced by the traveling public and shippers owing to the ice embargo in the Chesapeake Bay.——Last Wednesday, James McMahon, aged 35, of Washington, D. C., jumped from the second outside gallery of the dome of the Capitol, and struck head foremost on the roof of the main building, a distonce of at least 150 feet below. He was killed instantly, his skull being terribly fractured and his body crushed to a shapeless mass. Poverty and pride was probably the cause of the rash act.——The fishing schooners Joseph Chandler and James Burnam, of Gloucester, Mass., are reported lost, with their crews, numbering twenty-four men.——A large fleet of fishing schooners is imprisoned in the ice of Massachusetts Bay near Provincetown. For several days their position was most dangerous, but the ice closing enabled most of the men to escape to land, leaving a small force to care for the vessels. Over 170 of the men have arrived at Boston, showing plainly the evidences of hardship and starvation. At present there is little danger to the craft frozen in.——Last week a negro was admitted into the second class of boys in the High School at New Orleans. Twenty out of twenty-two in the class left the school immediately. There was no disturbance.——The frost has been so severe in New Hampshire that at Concord the workmen engaged in cutting ice on the river, report it to be four feet thick, an event that has never before occurred in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. The snow is four feet deep on a level and the roads are badly blocked up. This is the most severe winter experienced there for twenty years.

Foreign.

The severity of the winter in Sweden has caused a partial suspension in railway traffic in that country.——Two hundred thousand dollars have been appropriated by the Japanese Government for expenditure in connection with the Philadelphia Centennial. For the expenses of the Commissioners to examine industries and report, $100,000; for the exhibition of Japanese articles, $80,000; for transportation, $20,000. ——A dispatch from London states that five German men-of-war have been ordered to be in readiness for immediate service. It is supposed that they are to sail for Spanish waters in case there is any further delay of satisfaction from Spain in the Gustav outrage. This movement will probably force Spain to resume active measures against the Carlists.——Stanley, the Livingstone discoverer, is conducting another expedition through Africa. The latest London advices from Zanzibar state that his march was proving most successful.——Intense heat is being experienced in Australia, and several bush fires have occurred. Grasshoppers and locusts are not only destroying crops, but filling up wells and consuming textile fabrics, such as blinds and window curtains.——An Encyclical from the Pope to the Prussian Bishops is published. It denounces the Falk Ecclesiastical laws, and excommunicates members of the clergy who accept benefits from the State.——A dispatch from London says that intelligence of a serious disturbance in the city of Bethlehem, in Palestine, has been received. The Greeks made an attack upon the quarter of the city inhabited by Americans, and several on both sides were killed in the fight.——London capitalists and philanthropists have formed a stock company, with a capital of about $5,000,000, for the purpose of building a city to accommodate 16,000 working men on a plot of eighty acres they have purchased in the West End. It is to contain a park of four acres, streets and gardens tastefully laid out, and houses arranged for comfort, but with no beer or whisky shops in the place.——A match factory in Gottenburg, Sweden, crowded with work people, took fire on the 19th. The flames spread with such rapidity that the employes in the upper stories were cut off from escape, and many perished in the flames or were killed by jumping from the windows. Fifty-one lives are reported lost.

Home and Health Hints.

Be Cheerful at the Table.

Harper's Bazar, edited by a lady who probably knows whereof she affirms, has some very truthful remarks concerning a matter of interest to all the people, though perhaps designed more particularly for the eyes and ears of city folks. Listen:

Hasty eating is universally disapproved, and cheerful sociability recommended. Yet how often is the dinner hour the special time when the tired husband is treated to a detailed account of difficulties with servants and children, or the wife receives a depressing record of business troubles! The cook may have given warning. Willie may have ruined his best jacket, your pockets have been picked, or your day's work brought no gain; but these things will keep; talk them over at another time, but let the dinner hour be free from troublesome topics. Perhaps nothing is more prejudicial to the proper assimilation of food than disputation. The mind becomes irritated, and instantaneously the stomach sympathizes. A dinner-table is the worst possible place for an argument which may easily become heated and acrimonious. Nor should it be a place where children are constantly reproved, or their bad conduct suffered to distroy the comfort of the meal. Discipline in the household is highly necessary, but the wise mother will not make it a prominent feature at the table. Good news, happy thoughts, innocent mirth and cheerful evenings are the most efficacious relishes, and should be used freely. An uncomfortable meal, whatever may be the cause, is almost certain to produce indigestion. And though such small matters may be thought by many unimportant, they go very far toward the establishment of good health, and even the most robust cannot neglect them with impunity.

A Steam Boiler for Every One.—Any one can have a steam boiler, says a writer in the Kansas Farmer, by using a board with holes in it, laid upon the jog of a common boiler. This is all that is essential. though another board, fitted to the boiler and laid upon the clothes is desirable. The clothes will be light, all permeated by the foam coming up through them—the water and steam come seething up, pouring in a stream over the edge of the upper board (mine is made of two pieces of siding tied together) and running down the crack. Strong cords can be adjusted around the boards, by means of which the clothes can be raised, drained and taken out altogether.

Farm and Garden.

Eggs in Winter.—To have plenty of eggs in winter, the fowls must have warm roosting and nesting places, warm food, if possible, with some kind of animal food at least once a day, and water to drink at will; gravel and lime must be always at hand, and the poultry house must be kept scrupulously clean, and the fowls out of the way of vermine and free from lice.

Lice may be destroyed by an application of lard or sweet oil in which carbonic acid has been mixed at the rate of one part of acid to one hundred of oil or lard. For poultry, the mixture should be rubbed beneath the wings and on the top of the head, except in the case of setting hens, which should never have greece of any kind applied to them, if the eggs are to be hatched.

Stick to Your Farms.—The feeling that you are settled and fixed will induce you to go to work to improve your farms, to plant orchards, to set out shade trees, to inclose pastures, to build comfortable out-houses and each successive improvement is a bond to bind you still closer to your homes. This will bring contentment in the family. Your wives and daughters will fall in love with the country, your sons will love home more than the grog-shop and prefer farming to measuring tape or professional loafing, and you will be happy in seeing the contented and cheerful faces of your families.

Make your home beautiful, convenient and pleasant, and your children will love it above all other places; they will leave it with regret, think of it with fondness, come back to it joyfully, and seek their chief happiness around their home fireside.

Women and children need more than meat, bread and raiment; more than acres of corn and cotton spread out all around them. Their love of the beautiful must be satisfied. Their tastes must be cultivated. Their sensibilities humored, not shocked. To accomplish this good end, home must be made lovely, convenience multiplied, comforts provided, and cheerfulness fostered.

There must be sunshine and shade, luscious fruits and fragrant flowers, as well as corn and cotton. The mind and heart, as well as the fields, must be cultivated; and then intelligence and contentment will be the rule instead of the exception. Stick to, improve and beautify your homesteads, for with this good work comes contentment.

Cuttings of Grape Vines.—The Germantown Telegraph says: The Western Rural recommends that cuttings of grape vines should be taken in the fall and put in bundles, buried in the earth or packed in moist sand in the cellar. We do this cutting in February, bury in the earth in bundles, marked, and plant out in the spring. Except such as Delaware, Diana, and one or two others, the wood of which is very hard and difficult to grow, we have no trouble in growing any quality.

A Handy and Useful Basket.—Our farmers who market their apples, potatoes and garden vegetables can save themselves much labor by a few hours' work on some rainy day in manufacturing a lot of cheap market baskets. The basket or box holds a bushel, and is made of boards and lath. The ends are made of boards twelve inches wide and fourteen inches in length, with holes cut in the top side, near the center, for handles. Laths for the bottom and sides are cut seventeen and a half inches in length—four pieces of lath, one nailed on each side and six on the bottom, with shingle nails, and the basket or box is complete. A few dozen of these baskets cost but a trifle, and will be found very convenient for marketing and other purposes about the farm. For digging potatoes, all the loose dirt which goes into the basket will sift to the bottom, and the potatoes intended for market can be selected in the field and placed in the cellar in the baskets ready for market, and when sold to the retail dealer the baskets with their contents can be left with him, and the empty baskets procured when another quantity is ordered, thereby saving much labor in picking or shoveling up potatoes and other vegetables, and other contents are less liable to get bruised, and are much more convenient to handle than barrels or bags. Such baskets as described have been used by clam diggers for years past. The clams are thrown into baskets as taken from the mud and washed clean by immersing the basket with its contents several times in water. Potatoes and garden vegetables can be cleaned of the dirt which adheres to them very expeditiously in the same manner.

Temperance.

Table Drinking in Scotland.—D. K. Flickinger, editor of the Missionary Visitor, Dayton, O., is now absent for a time with the United Brethren missionaries in Africa. On his journey he stopped in Glasgow and thus describes the table customs:

And now again I must speak of that terrible habit of taking strong drink. At the table, last evening, every one had a bottle of wine, or something stronger, except myself and the man who called thirteen an unlucky number. Glass after glass was poured out and drank. Indeed, each bottle was quite emptied. That some of the company will die drunkards is quite certain, though composed of first-class men. I came to this hotel because it was reported to be a temperance house; but if this is the kind of temperancee houses they have in Scotland, then there is need of some table-abstinence hotels. Oh, this hydra-headed monster of strong drink, which takes men's money, their reputation, morals, and everything they have that is valuable, even their souls, and gives nothing in return. Why is it tolerated? Is there not some way to relieve the world of this demon? Let the readers of the Missionary Visitor resolve now and always to touch not this accursed thing, and by example and precept do all that is possible to induce those who do drink to abstain from it.

The Tobacco Trade.—As showing the importance of the tobacco interest in the United States, advance sheets of the yearly official report of the trade, for the year ending June 30, 1874, among other items, states that there were exported from the United States, of native leaf tobacco, 318,097,804 pounds, amounting in value to $30,389,181. In the same period there were manufactured in the United States, of foreign and domestic tobacco, and tax paid on 1,780,961,000 cigars.

A Woman's Single-Handed Crusade.

"That man is killing my husband and ruining my son!" was the startling sentence uttered by a lady as she stepped from the door of a drinking saloon yesterday morning in the eastern section of the city, while the proprietor, a young man, in his shirt sleeves bowed and smiled her out. "I have been to him," she said, as she raised her parasol, "to beg him not to sell my husband or my son anything to drink." The speaker was a neatly dressed American woman, of apparently middle age, of pleasing voice and refined manner. Her utterances showed how deeply she had been moved, and her actions told to what desperation she had been driven to go to "that place," as she styled it, to beg for the very lives of those she loved more than her own life. But to those who were passing—to the hurrying throngs on the sidewalks—nothing of the woman's heart-ache was betrayed, and the writer would have been equally unconscious of her heroic struggle had not the first exclamation she made on reaching the street been apparently addressed to him, in the same way that a drowning man would catch at the nearest straw.

She had been to other places of the kind earlier, and was going to still another before she could consider her day's work done. She said, "They take my husband's money and they credit him when he has no money. My son is going in the same way, and I am driven to despair. I have been in comfortable circumstances, but now I am reduced to absolute want, and have not bread even for my son's dear little boy. Oh, if I could do it, and how impotent and wretched I feel, I would wash the streets of Baltimore with strong drink. My heart is broken; my hope is gone, and you see even the fountain of my tears is dried up, for I cannot even cry." She turned her tearless, despair-stricken face to the narrator, and wished that she could shed the tears that once gave some measure of relief.

A few steps brought her to the last place she had designed calling, but she said "I must collect myself for the work before me in that den—that horrible place," and bidding the writer good morning, she sought refuge in a church near by to gain strength in prayer for the crusade of a broken heart in which she had enlisted single-handed against such odds.—Baltimore Sun.

Facts and Figures.

—Massachusetts is a model State. Gov. Gaston states in his message that of the fifty-two million of passengers carried over the railroads of Massachusetts during the twelve months, but a single one was killed, and but seven were injured. This is a record of which the State may well be proud. It is a noticable fact, however, that railroad accidents are yearly decreasing in number as the appliances for their prevention multiply.

—Mr. Attwood, a rich old bachelor, died recently near Chestnut, England, and it now turns out that he was the giver of all the anonymous 1,000*l* checks which have caused so much speculation. He gave about 350,000*l* away in this fashion, 45,000*l* within the last year.

—The Bank of France has one brick for which 1,000 francs was paid in gold. It was taken from the ruins of a burnt house, and the image and figures of a note for 1,000 francs, transferred from a real note, are burned upon its surface. The owner presented it to the bank, and it was redeemed as if it were the note itself.

—At a recent meeting of the Wisconsin teachers, Prof. Waitford read a paper on the "Co-education of the Sexes." He said that of 1,000 academies nearly two-thirds, of 119 normal schools, 73, of 323 colleges and universities three-eights are attended by both males and females, there being 92 of the last named so attended, 92 in the first, 101 denominational, and 24 non sectarian; that among the special schools the business colleges excell all others in furnishing equal facilities for ladies and gentlemen, the industrial schools stand next, and the medical and law schools instruct a few women, while the theological seminaries are practically closed to females.

DIMENSIONS OF THE LAKES.—The length of Lake Superior on a curved line is 400 miles; greatest breadth 150 miles; area 38,875 square miles; area of water shed, 51,638 square miles; discharge at outlet, 90,738 cubic feet per second; length of coast line, 1,700 miles; temperature of surface water in summer, 50 to 55 degrees Fahrenheit; of the water below 200 feet, 39 degrees; deepest sounding, 1,014 feet; elevation of its surface above the sea 600 feet.

Lake Huron's length is 260 miles; greatest breadth, 100 miles; area, 29,482 square miles; discharge at outlet, 283,725 cubic feet per second; deepest sounding, 702 feet; elevation of surface above the sea, 578 feet.

The length of Lake Michigan is 320 miles; greatest breadth—from Milwaukee to Grand Haven—84 miles; deepest sounding, 870 feet; elevation of surface, 578 feet.

Lake Erie—length, 240 miles; greatest breadth, 60 miles, area, 9,522 square miles; area of water shed, 21,371 square miles; discharge at outlet, 242,894 cubic feet per second; deepest sounding, 240 feet; elevation of surface above the sea, 565 feet.

In length Lake Ontario is 180 miles; greatest breadth, 55 miles; area, 7,181 square miles; area of water shed, 51,587 square miles discharge at outlet, 325,839 cubic feet per second; greatest depth, 600 feet. The grand total of these lakes (including several smaller lakes) is 108,691 square miles, showing that our lakes constitute about one-third of all the fresh water on the globe.

—The Western Union Telegraph Company operates more miles of telegraph line than all Switzerland, Sweden, Holland, Belgium, Hungary, Spain, Bavaria, Denmark, Norway, Portugal, Greece, Wurtemburg, and Great Britain combined. It operates more miles of telegraph and annually transmits more messages than all Germany, Spain, Hungary, and Russia, notwithstanding that these countries have nearly the same area of territory, and nearly four times the population of the United States. Europe has a population of 300,000,000, and sends annually 50,000,000 of messages, being one message to six persons. The United States have 40,000,000 inhabitants, and the Western Union Company alone sends 15,000,000 messages, being one message to two and half persons. In 1866 England had 80,466 miles of telegraph wire, and in 1873, 99,918, miles, being an increase of 16,093, or 24 per cent. In 1866 the Western Union Company had 75,686 miles of telegraph wire, and in 1873, 154,471, being an increase of 78,785, or 104 per cent. In 1866 England had 2,151 telegraph offices, and in 1873, 5,474, being an increase of 3,323, or 154 per cent. In 1866 the Western Union Company had 2,200 offices, and in 1873, 5,740, being an increase of 3,540 or 160 per cent. In 1867 England transmitted 7,500,000 messages, and in 1872, 14,858,000, being an increase of 7,358,000, or 98 per cent. In 1868 the Western Union Company sent 5,733,394 messages, and in 1873, 13,362,837, being an increase of 7,629,438 messages, or 133 per cent. In 1868 the average toll upon the English lines was 38 cents per message. In 1874 the average toll is 28, being a reduction of 16 cents per message, or 26 per cent. In 1868 the average toll upon the Western Union lines was $1.10 per message, and in 1874, 55 cents, being a reduction of 55 cents per message, or 50 per cent.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"A MASONIC REVELATION.—Mr. Samuel D. Greene is a venerable gentleman of the highest respectability, whose statements seem to be worthy of full credence. The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder, is the title of a book of some three hundred pages just issued by him, purporting to give a full and accurate account, from personal knowledge, of the Morgan 'abduction,' and other masonic matters which made such an excitement in this country, now almost half a century ago."—Congregationalist and Recorder, Boston.

"'FREEMASONRY DEVELOPED.'—'The Broken Seal: or, Personal Reminiscences of the Morgan Abduction and Murder,' is the title of a volume written and just published by Samuel D. Greene, of Boston. The author belonged to the same lodge with Morgan, and professes to know all about that event which made such a sensation throughout the country forty years ago. The book contains the confession of Morgan's murderer, and much more curious and interesting matter, including the ceremony of initiation, etc. The author opposes Freemasonry as inimical to good government, to society, and to the Church; and the story that he here tells will make a sensation in the order, if its statements are really what they purport to be. If Freemasonry is what it is supposed by many to be, in its obligations, the author of this book must be a bold man."—Daily Herald, Boston.

"We are acquainted with Mr. Greene, and have no doubt that his account is entirely reliable, and of great historic and moral interest. Capt. Wm. Morgan was Mr. Greene's neighbor in Batavia, N. Y., and a member of the same lodge with him at the time of the great excitement in 1826. The titles to these chapters are sufficiently exciting to give the book a large sale:—"The Storm Gathering;" "Abduction of Morgan;" "Attempted Abduction of Miller and his Rescue;" "What became of Morgan;" "What Morgan Actually Revealed;" "Confession of the Murderer;" "Allegations against Freemasonry, etc."—Boston Daily News.

We are encouraged by the appreciation which so many show of the importance to the cause of enlarging the Cynosure subscription list. May the number be multiplied.

Postage on the Cynosure.

The postage on the Cynosure must be paid at Chicago. It is twenty cents a year.

The cost of postage now depends entirely on the size and weight, and therefore some smaller papers charge but fifteen cents; and others about the size of the Cynosure charge twenty-five cents a year for postage.

If the subscription price of the Cynosure was $2.50 or $3.00 a year, the price of many religious papers containing no more reading matter, we might afford to pay the postage ourselves, but at $2.00 a year we cannot do this with our present Subscription list.

Therefore let all send the postage, 20 cents a year, 10 cents for half a year with their renewals.

The commission on one new subscription for a year will pay the postage on your own and the new subscriber's paper. We would rather have the postage paid by commissions than in any other way.

When postage is not paid we shall have to shorten the time of subscription sufficiently to pay it.

The contents of the Eleventh chapter are thus startling:
